By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 217. A bill to amend part A of title IV of the Social Security Act to reduce the need for emergency assistance payments to provide temporary housing for destitute families eligible for AFDC, and the expense of such payments, by authorizing grants to States for the construction or rehabilitation of permanent housing that such families can afford with their regular AFDC, payments; to the Committee on Finance.

PERMANENT HOUSING FOR HOMELESS FAMILIES ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, why does the city of New York pay $37,000 a year to house a homeless family in a "welfare hotel?" No doubt many Americans will recall President Reagan wondering aloud during a 1986 press conference, "Why doesn't somebody build them a house for $37,000?"

At that time, nobody seemed to know the answer. In fact, it is very simple. "Somebody" cannot now use the Federal funds paid to welfare hotel slumlords to build permanent homes for the homeless. Current law prohibits it.

Astonishingly, the city of New York has spent up to $37,000 annually on temporary housing for homeless families. Such temporary housing generally consists of a tiny living space in one of some 40 private "welfare hotels" scattered about the city. The hotels are more often than not located in neighborhoods unfit for the young children who live there. Indeed, these hotels are typically filthy, crime and drug infested firetraps. Children die in them.

Is there anyone who disagrees that it would be both more cost-effective and more humane to house these families in permanent residences? But, under current law, funds received under the emergency assistance section of the Federal Welfare Program may be used only to provide temporary shelter for the homeless. That may have made sense in 1967 when the Emergency Assistance Program was first enacted into law. But things change.

In recent years, the homeless population has changed profoundly. First, the population has grown enormously. Nationwide, estimates of the homeless population range from a low of 200,000 to a high of 2 to 3 million. In 1983, the number of families receiving emergency shelter in New York City averaged 1,500 families monthly. By October of 1988, that number had increased to some 5,000 families, an increase of over 200 percent. Requests for emergency shelter continue to climb, albeit at a somewhat slower rate. On January 17, 1989, the U.S. Conference of Mayors released their latest 27-city survey. In 1988, requests for emergency shelter grew by 13 percent, down from 21 percent in 1987. Precious little to cheer about.

Second, the new homeless are not the skid row derelicts of yesteryear. A quarter of the homeless have jobs, but earn too little to afford housing. The fastest growing group of homeless are young women with children. The mayors find that families with children make up more than half the homeless population of Detroit, Norfolk, Portland, Trenton, and my own city, New York. Indeed. in New York City, where over 10,000 children are housed in emergency shelters, families with children make up nearly two-thirds of the homeless. In other cities, on average, families with children constitute one-third of the homeless population.

Third, the new homelessness is primarily due to a severe shortage of affordable housing. Put plainly, there are too many people with too little money fighting for too little housing that costs too much. Add to this the rapid increase in poor female-headed families and the steep decline in Federal support for low-income housing (between fiscal year 1981 and fiscal year 1988 Federal budget authority was slashed by 72 percent) and you have a recipe for disaster.

The mayors cannot solve this tragedy alone. They decry Federal indifference. They are right. There is blame enough to go around. But rather than point fingers, let us begin to put the situation right. Toward this end, at the outset of this 101st Congress, I am reintroducing the Permanent Housing for Homeless Families Act. This bill will allow States and cities to spend a portion of their AFDC-Emergency Assistance funds on grants for the construction of permanent housing for homeless AFDC families.

Since the Emergency Assistance [EA] program is operated on an entitlement basis, States may continue to receive EA funds to provide temporary shelter for homeless families while the construction of permanent housing is under way. Instead of continuing to subsidize welfare hotel slumlords, the Federal Government can help State and local governments make a permanent dent in homelessness.

This legislation is also being introduced in the House by my colleague from New York, Representative CHARLES SCHUMER. It is similar to legislation he and I first offered in the 99th Congress, and again in the 100th Congress.

Our bill will amend title IV (aid to families with dependent children) of the Social Security Act, to allow Federal matching funds under the existing Emergency Assistance Program to be used for the construction or renovation of permanent homes for poor families with children. Federal funds will only be made available to State and local governments meeting specified requirements.

Among these requirements: First, all units constructed or rehabilitated must be rented to AFDC-eligible families that have been unable to obtain affordable, permanent housing, and would otherwise be left without shelter. Second, before receiving Federal funds, the city and State would have to demonstrate that the permanent housing will reduce their total AFDC costs for the homeless over a 5-year period.

I want to stress this latter point. The Permanent Housing for Homeless Families Act is designed to ensure that the Federal Government actually saves money under the Emergency Assistance Program after 5 years. Participating States and localities will be required to contribute substantial resources of their own to any federally assisted construction. In brief, the State and local government combined share of costs under this program must be 10 percentage points higher than their current share of AFDC payments. For example, a State with a 50-percent share of AFDC costs would have to shoulder a 60-percent share of EA money used for the construction of permanent housing.

Last year, Mr. President, as part of the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Amendments Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-628), Congress authorized a small demonstration project to permit States to use Federal funds to provide "transitional" housing for homeless AFDC families. Anything is better than the hellholes we politely refer to as welfare hotels. However, transitional housing is merely a temporary solution. We need permanent, affordable housing.

I might point out to my colleagues that last year the Senate adopted, as part of the Family Security Act of 1988 (S. 1511), a demonstration project similar to the legislation I offer today. Unfortunately, this provision was dropped in conference prior to the bill's enactment into law (Public Law 100-485).

I urge my colleagues, therefore, to once again lend their support to this modest initiative. It will not, by itself, solve the tragedy of homelessness, but it moves us a step in the right direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 217

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Permanent Housing for Homeless Families Act."

AUTHORIZATION OF GRANTS

SECTION 1. Part A of title IV of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"AUTHORIZATION OF GRANTS TO PROVIDE PERMANENT HOUSING FOR FAMILIES THAT OTHERWISE WOULD REQUIRE EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 416. (a) The Secretary may make a grant to any State for the construction or rehabilitation of permanent housing to serve individuals and families who would otherwise require emergency assistance in the form of temporary housing, if the State makes application for such a grant in the manner and form prescribed by the Secretary, furnishes the assurances required by subsection (b), and satisfies such other terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe to assure that the purposes of this section are effectively carried out.

"(b) A grant may be made to a State under subsection (a) only if such State (along with or as a part of its application) furnishes the Secretary with satisfactory assurances that—

"(1) the proceeds of the grant will be used exclusively for the construction or rehabilitation of permanent housing to be owned by the State, a political subdivision of the State, an agency or instrumentality of the State, or of a political subdivision of the State, or a nonprofit organization;

"(2) all units assisted with funds from the proceeds of the grant will be used exclusively for rental to families which—

"(A) are eligible (at the time of the rental) for aid under the State's plan approved under section 402, provided that a family with some members who meet this requirement shall not be deemed ineligible because one or more other family members receive aid under title XVI of the Social Security Act.

"(B) have been unable to obtain decent housing at rents that can be paid with the portion of such aid allocated for shelter, and

"(C) if such housing were not available to them, would be compelled to live in a shelter for the homeless or in a hotel, motel, or other temporary accommodations paid for with emergency assistance or would be homeless;

"(3) the local jurisdiction in which such housing will be located is experiencing a critical shortage of housing units that are available to families eligible for aid under the State plan at rents that can be paid with the portion of such aid allocated for shelter; and

"(4) whenever units assisted under this section become available for occupancy, the State will discontinue the use of an equivalent number of units of the most costly accommodations it has been using as temporary housing paid for with emergency assistance, except to the extent that such accommodations are demonstrably needed—

"(A) in addition to the units so assisted, to take account of increases in the caseload under that program; or

"(B) because, due to the condition or location of such accommodations, or other factors, discontinuing the use of such units would not be in the best interests of needy families, provided that the State discontinues the use of an equivalent number of other units it has been using as temporary housing paid for with emergency assistance; and only if the State, along with or as a part of its application, includes provisions (to be added to the State plan) for carrying out the requirements of paragraph (4).

"(c)(1) The average cost to the Federal Government per unit of housing constructed or rehabilitated with a grant under this section shall be an amount no greater than the standard yearly payment (as defined in subsection (d)(2)) of emergency assistance that would be required to provide housing for a family in a shelter for the homeless, a hotel or motel, or other temporary quarters for one year.

"(2) The total of Federal payments to the State under this part over the 5-year period beginning at the time construction or rehabilitation commences, with respect to families who will live in housing assisted by a grant provided under this section (the "total grant cost" as calculated according to the definition in subsection (d)(3)) must be lower as a result of the construction or rehabilitation of permanent housing with the grant than the total amount of Federal payments under this part that would have been made if the State made emergency assistance payments with respect to the families involved at the level of the standard yearly payment (as defined in subsection (d)(2)) during such 5-year period. If the "total grant cost" is not lower than such total amount of Federal payments, the State shall be responsible for paying the difference between such cost and such total amount. The Secretary may extend this 5-year period for calculating cost savings to any period of no more than 7 years if he determines that unusual circumstances have delayed completion of housing to be constructed or rehabilitated pursuant to this section and that it would be inequitable to measure costs savings over a 5 year period.

"(3) Any grant to a State under subsection (a) shall be made only on condition that such State (and the local jurisdiction in which the housing is to be located) pay a percentage of the total cost of the construction or rehabilitation of such housing equal at least to the percentage of the current non-Federal share of aid to families with dependent children under the State plan which is applicable to that State (as determined under section 403(a) or 1118), increased by 10 percentage points and that such State not require its political subdivisions to pay a higher percentage of the total costs of the construction or rehabilitation of such housing that these political subdivisions pay for aid given pursuant to the State plan approved under section 402.

"(d) For the purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'emergency assistance' means emergency assistance to needy families with children as described in section 406(e) or regular payments for costs of temporary housing authorized as special items under the State plan;

"(2) the term 'standard yearly payment' with respect to emergency assistance used to provide housing for a family in a shelter for the homeless, a hotel or motel, or other temporary quarters for 1 year during any year in any jurisdiction, means an amount equal to the total amount of such assistance which was needed to provide all housing in temporary accommodations in that jurisdiction (with emergency assistance), in the most recently completed calendar year at the 75th percentile in the range of all payments of emergency assistance for temporary accommodations, based on the State's actual experience with emergency assistance in such jurisdictions;

"(3) the term 'total grant cost' with respect to housing constructed or rehabilitated under this section, means the sum of—

"(A) the Federal share of payments attributable to the construction or rehabilitation of such housing during the 5-year period beginning on the date on which construction or rehabilitation begins,

"(B) the Federal share of payments of emergency assistance for temporary housing to the families involved during the 5-year period in which such housing is undergoing construction or rehabilitation (at a level equal to the standard yearly payment), and

"(C) the Federal share of regular payments of aid under the State plan to such families during the remainder of such 5-year period (or any longer period established by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (c), subparagraph 2 of this section).

"(e) Whenever a grant is made to a State under this section, the assurances required of the State under paragraphs (1) through (5) of subsection (b) and any other requirements imposed by the Secretary as a condition of such grant shall be considered, for purposes of section 404, as requirements imposed by or in the administration of the State's plan under section 402.".

S. 218. A bill to charter the National Academy of Social Insurance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SOCIAL INSURANCE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on this the first day of legislation in the 101st Congress, I wish to introduce a bill to grant a Federal charter to the National Academy of Social Insurance.

The Academy was established in May 1986 by a distinguished group of individuals from business, labor, government, and the academic community. Although their professional backgrounds are diverse, each has achieved distinction in the field of social insurance. I am honored to serve as a member of the Academy's Board of Advisers, together with my colleague, and the cosponsor of this bill, Senator HEINZ.

The National Academy of Social Insurance has come just when needed. The remarkable group who produced and nurtured Social Security are now collecting it. An institutional memory is vitally needed to guide us through the issues confronting our most important domestic program. The time has come to open up what has been a very closely held public trust and to improve the public discussion and understanding of Social Security. The National Academy of Social Insurance will do this.

The Washington Post recently referred to the Social Security Program as "one of the greatest governmental success stories of this century," which, as we all know, is true. And yet people don't believe it. They have no confidence in the system. Attempts by the Reagan administration to cut benefits naturally contributed to this lack of confidence. As early as 1981 the then newly appointed Director of the Office of Management and Budget was declaring with respect to the trust funds that the "most devastating bankruptcy in history" was months away. This, of course, was never true—at worst checks woud have gone out a couple of days late—but it served to justify the administration's 1981 proposals for massive Social Security cuts. And then in 1985 we saw then Vice President George Bush cast the tie-breaking vote in the Senate to cut the COLA.

But the truth is, this lack of confidence actually was evident before all that. In 1979, Peter D. Hart Research Associates conducted a nationwide survey for the National Commission on Social Security. The survey was designed to determine the public's attitude toward Social Security and found that 61 percent of the nonretired had little confidence that funds would be available to pay their retirement benefits. Sadly, the public's confidence had sunk even lower by 1985 when a survey by Yankelovich, Skelly & White showed that 66 percent, two-thirds, of nonretired adults thought it unlikely that they would ever see their benefits—two-thirds! Last month the American Council of Life Insurance published some data that indicate an improvement in 1988. I welcome the news, but I put it to you that the lack of public confidence remains the biggest problem facing Social Security. The system is, after all, a compact across generations. The willingness of young workers to fund the program rests on the confidence that it will be there for them when they need it.

That is why, Mr. President, the National Academy of Social Insurance is so needed, and a Federal charter warranted. Until now, there has been no organization of independent and nonpartisan scholars and experts to plan and carry out a long-term education and research agenda, to promote an exchange of ideas, or to develop informed policy proposals.

I close with a note of thanks to the Academy for its thorough and careful study on the Social Security "notch" issue, released on November 16, 1988. The distinguished minority leader, Senator DOLE, and I requested this study to help educate Finance Committee members on this extremely complex and often misunderstood subject, and the Social Security Subcommittee, which I chair, held a hearing on this report on January 23. We are much indebted to the Academy for this excellent and lucid report which will do much to inform the public discussion and debate on this often controversial issue.

I hope that my colleagues will join with me in this effort to secure a Federal charter for the National Academy of Social Insurance. We got this measure through the Senate last year as part of the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988, but the conference ran into a jurisdictional problem on the House side. I am confident we can work this out, though, with the help of Congressman JACOBS, chairman of the House Social Security Subcommittee, who has assured me that he will sponsor this measure in the House.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I join with my colleague from New York in introducing legislation to grant a national charter to the National Academy of Social Insurance [NASI]. The National Academy of Social Insurance is an important organization, formed only 3 years ago, to provide a forum for an elite group of experts from diverse backgrounds in business, labor, Government, and the academic community to discuss the problems that confront social insurance programs and offer options for the future.

Members of the Academy represent the institutional memory of the Social Security program; they represent persons committed to social insurance. This exemplary organization has as its mission—the challenge to investigate, evaluate, and educate Members of the Congress and those people who elect us on the current state of the Social Security program. This, as we all well know, is no small task.

Mr. President, today, the Social Security program touches practically every American family. But despite the importance of social insurance in the United States, few people know the programs well. As public opinion polls consistently show, social insurance programs are immensely popular, but there is often little indepth understanding. Confusion is widespread, not only among the public, but among academicians and policymakers—about the history, purposes, structure, scope, and future viability of the social insurance.

For some time, we have needed an independent nongovernmental organization to promote informed discussion and debate about the issues which face the Congress—problems associated with an aging population and the burden this will place on our social insurance program, problems such as the relationship of the Social Security trust fund to the budget, concerns over the Social Security notch and so forth. We have needed an independent organization to develop an education and research agenda. And, we have needed to stimulate fresh thinking with regards to Social Security. Until the establishment of the National Academy, however, no such organization has existed to satisfy these needs.

The National Academy, in its 3-year history, has already contributed to our understanding of issues of concern to the Congress. On December 15, 1988, I was priviledged to have the opportunity to speak at the first annual meeting of the National Academy. The focus of this meeting was to discuss the relationship of the Social Security trust fund to the budget. In addition, the academy has just recently investigated the Social Security notch issue at the request of two Members of the Congress. We can expect that these two contributions are just the first of many.

Past recipients of national charters have been recognized as organizations which are of special significance to our country, either because of the people they represent or by the unique services they provide. The National Academy of Social Insurance is of such a caliber that, it too, should receive national recognition for its service and commitment to this country and its social insurance program.

By granting a national charter to this prestigious national academy, the Congress can give recognition to the importance of quality research and policy regarding this country's social insurance programs. The signal this charter will send to the experts in the area of social insurance is that we, in the Congress, are dedicated to serious and ongoing investigation to produce concerned and thoughtful policy to insulate the aged and disabled from loss of income after employment.

Mr. President, I am proud of this organization and am proud to be a member, along with my colleague from New York, of its advisory board. They are committed to preserving and enhancing a quality, effective social insurance program. I urge my fellow colleagues to join with Senator MOYNIHAN and myself in recognizing this organization and our social insurance programs by granting a Federal charter.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 219. A bill to exclude the Social Security trust funds from the deficit calculation and to extend the target date for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings until fiscal year 1997; to the Committees on the Budget and Governmental Affairs jointly persuant to order of 8-4-77.

SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUND SANCTITY ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation that will provide a very important safeguard for the Social Security System.

The legislation, titled the Social Security Trust Fund Sanctity Act, would accomplish a simple but extremely important goal. It would remove the Social Security trust funds from budget calculations under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction scheme. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets and timetable would be revised to take account of this, and to produce a balanced non-Social Security budget by 1997.

Mr. President, since the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform agreed in 1983 on a plan to safeguard the financial stability of the Social Security System, we have been able to restore a measure of confidence in the System.

Let us not forget that the Reagan administration began with discussions of "privatizing" Social Security, followed by David Stockman's threats of a "bankrupt" Social Security System. "A scare campaign of vicious proportions," as stated by Sylvia Porter, was launched by the administration in the early 1980's.

Fortunately, the national commission, on which I served with the distinguished minority leader, Senator DOLE, was able to reach a consensus on restoring the financial stability of Social Security. We have done that. Social Security revenues are now running ahead of outlays by over $109 million per day. The System is actuarially sound well into the next century.

Nevertheless, skeptics continue to criticize the System. Consider the scurrilous article by John Makin of the American Enterprise Institute in The New York Times which likened Social Security to a "ponzi scheme." The scare campaign continues.

That is why I feel it necessary to introduce the Social Security Trust Fund Sanctity Act. We must make it clear that the Federal deficit remains a great challenge to the Nation. We must also make it clear that the Social Security System is in excellent, indeed robust, financial condition.

Using the Social Security trust funds to offset the budget deficit simply disguises the true magnitude of our budget deficit problem. Surely this is counterproductive. If we agree that the deficit is truly a national problem, then we shouldn't be covering it up with accounting tricks.

But worse, we are squandering an opportunity to increase our national savings. Currently our Social Security surpluses are being borrowed to help finance current Government consumption. We must take the trust funds out of the deficit calculations and deal with the real budget deficit problem. Only then can the trust fund surpluses be used to increase our savings, investment, and economic growth.

But consider the comments of then-Secretary of the Treasury James Baker in response to a question from George Will about how the Social Security surpluses should be accounted.

. . . I think it is quite appropriate to . . . treat the Social Security trust fund as a part of the unified budget. After all, every dollar that we tax the American taxpayer to pay into the Social Security trust fund hurts him just as much as every dollar that he pays in income taxes. And we need a process whereby we look at our government expenditures as a financial condition of the United States government as a whole. So people who suggest that we ought to take the Social Security trust fund off budget I think are to some extent politically motivated.

Politically motivated? Was the bipartisan national commission politically motivated when it made such a recommendation in 1983? Indeed, Social Security is already treated off-budget, except for the Gramm-Rudman deficit calculation. Unfortunately, it was others, including those in the Reagan administration, who were politically motivated when they arranged to credit the surpluses to the reduction of an operating budget deficit that remains, as David Stockman recognized, "$200 billion as far as the eye can see."

Indeed, the deficit in the operating budget for the current fiscal year will be $199 billion, according to Congressional Budget Office estimates of August 1988. But this will be offset for Gramm-Rudman purposes by an "off-budget" Social Security trust fund surplus of $52 billion this year, bringing us closer to the Gramm-Rudman deficit target of $136 billion for this fiscal year. Mr. President, this information is shown in a table published by CBO, and I ask that it be included in the RECORD at the end of my remarks. This table also shows that, contrary to popular belief, the operating budget deficit is growing bigger, not coming down. The CBO baseline projection is that by 1994 the on-budget deficit will grow to $234 billion. Under the current practice, this would be masked by a Social Security trust fund surplus of $113 billion in that year. One can easily see the madness. Increasingly large budget deficits eating up increasingly large Social Security surpluses—surpluses we put in place back in 1983 to provide for the retirement of the baby boom in the next century.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues, this must stop. This bill would focus our attention and efforts on the real problem, which is the growing deficit in the non-Social Security budget. It would take the Social Security trust funds out of Gramm-Rudman calculations and get us on the track to eliminating the deficit in the operating budget by 1997. I ask for the support of the Senate to pass this measure, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and table be printed in the RECORD at the end of my statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 220. A bill to provide for flexibility in the use of Federal highway program grants authorized under title 23, United States Code, and other Federal infrastructure grants to establish a National Infrastructure Corporation, to provide additional financing for a variety of public works improvements, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce "The National Infrastructure Act of 1989." The purpose of this legislation is to establish new mechanisms for financing the much needed work that must be done to rehabilitate and expand the Nation's public works infrastructure, the basic underpinnings of its well-being and economic growth.

OUR DECLINING INFRASTRUCTURE

The National Council on Public Works Improvement stated in its report released in February 1988, Fragile Foundations, that there is "* * * convincing evidence that the quality of America's infrastructure is barely adequate to fulfill current requirements, and insufficient to meet the demands of future economic growth and development."

For example, while total real public works spending is increasing in absolute terms, from $60.4 billion per year in 1960 to $97.7 billion in 1985, it is declining as a Government spending priority. Federal, State, and local governments together devoted 6.8 percent—out of a $1.428 trillion total expenditures—of their budgets to public works in 1985, as compared to 19 percent—of $239 billion—in 1950.

In New York City, half the bridges are rated in poor or fair condition, some with visible cracks in their grating. Three of the city's East River bridges, the Williamsburg Bridge, the Manhattan Bridge, and the Queensboro Bridge, require substantial reconstruction. The only reason the Brooklyn Bridge does not is that such a major reworking was just completed. In the case of one bridge last year, as reported by the New York Times, a hole "the size of a Buick" was found in the pavement.

There has been no major airport built in the United States since 1974 at Dallas-Fort Worth, although over this same period commercial air traffic has doubled.

In April 1987 outside the small community of Amsterdam, NY, the Schoharie Creek bridge on New York State's Thomas E. Dewey Thruway collapsed killing 10 people and causing untold economic loss.

According to the Los Angeles County Transportation Commission, the cost of congestion in Los Angeles County is about 485,000 hours per day of wasted time by drivers. That is about 72 million gallons of gas per year—just in one county.

Three studies that have received a great deal of attention presented their findings in terms of annual capital investment shortfalls for major categories of public works infrastructure. These reports, by the Congressional Budget Office, the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, and the Associated General Contractors, found a shortfall ranging from $17.4 to $71.4 billion per annum. The National Council on Public Works Improvement recommended that we double current spending on public works.

OUR WORK IN THE ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS COMMITTEE

We are now at an important turning point in the history of the Federal Government's role in infrastructure. In the last 2 years the Congress has enacted legislation to bring to an end its two largest infrastructure programs. The Interstate Highway Program, which has spent over $230 billion on our Nation's roads since its inception in 1956, is close to completion. In 1991 the interstates will be finished, or as near as makes no matter. The Clean Water Act program for grants to the States for the construction of waste-water treatment plants, which has distributed over $52 billion since passage of the Clean Water Act in 1972, will also be coming to an end. This was assured by passage of amendments to the Clean Water Act in 1987. All of this makes evident the need for a new direction, and new ideas.

At the beginning of the 100th Congress, we established the Water Resources, Transportation, and Infrastructure Subcommittee of the Committee on Environment and Public Works. In effect, we reconstituted the old Senate Committee on Public Works as a subcommittee. I suspect that arrangement will be carried forward into the 101st Congress, although the subcommittee may go by a different, hopefully shorter name. Our intent was to examine the Nation's infrastructure, reevaluate our requirements, and develop policies to meet them.

We held five hearings, the first of which featured the historic appearance of the Speaker of the House, JIM WRIGHT, as a witness. We have learned much through this hearing process.

We have also had the benefit of the work of the National Council on Public Works Improvement, which was commissioned by the Public Works Improvement Act of 1984 to survey our Nation's infrastructure and report to the President and the Congress.

THE NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE ACT OF 1989

The bill I am presenting today, the National Infrastructure Act of 1989, has one major purpose: to reinforce the traditional and time-honored Federal role in providing financial assistance for large, capital intensive projects. The bill also recognizes that we must spend our money wisely by conducting research and development activities and stimulating technological innovation.

This year's bill is a modified version of S. 2088, legislation I introduced into the 100th Congress of February 24, 1988.

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE CORPORATION

This legislation would establish a National Infrastructure Corporation to provide financial help to projects of regional and national importance. Such might include new beltways around major cities, new major airports, or middle distance magnetic levitation systems between large cities. The corporation would be limited to providing loans for at most a 33-percent share of the cost of any project. This would force each and every undertaking to undergo the test of finding a majority of its financing in other markets. This market test is a sound public policy principle, which our committee used in the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 to make Corps of Engineers work more responsive to local circumstances. By requiring local cost sharing, we have seen a dramatic downsizing of corps projects. The Federal Government is no longer paying 100 percent of project costs, and people are much more mindful of asking for only what they need, and no more. The work of highest priority is the work that is being done.

MONETARY RETURN ON INFRASTRUCTURE INVESTMENT

The capitalization of this corporation does not require us to raise taxes. The corporation would be funded from interest earned on the over $25 billion of unexpended balance in the Federal transportation trust funds. Principal would not be touched. This interest will equal approximately $2.3 billion per year.

I would stress that the specifics mentioned here are ideas only. I hope this bill will stimulate discussion and thinking, and that good ideas will breed more good ideas. Future additions may include modifications to the Federal Tax Code to allow States and localities greater access to capital markets, or refinements to the basic structures outlined here.

Providing for the integrity and well-being of the basic structures and services required by a modern society will be one of the most problematic and challenging matters we will face in the coming decades. We had best start doing something about it now.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 220

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "National Infrastructure Act of 1989".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Nation as a whole has ceased investing in its public works infrastructure;

(2) since 1980, real economic growth has averaged 2.3 percent per year, but during this same period total capital stocks of public works infrastructure have shown no appreciable growth;

(3) the National Council on Public Works Improvement has reported that, after accounting for physical depreciation, public spending on infrastructure has decreased from 3.6 percent of GNP in 1960 to 2.6 percent in 1985;

(4) shortfalls in public investment for infrastructure have been estimated to equal between $17 billion and $70 billion per year;

(5) local governments have become increasingly burdened with financing the construction and maintenance of public works infrastructure and the Federal share of public investment has dropped from 31 percent in 1960 to 27 percent in 1985, while the local share has risen from 41 percent to 49 percent during the same period;

(6) the National Council on Public Works Improvement has recommended that total capital spending on public works infrastructure at all levels of government be doubled;

(7) adequate infrastructure investment is necessary for an efficient and growing domestic economy, international economic competitiveness, and a sustainable standard of living and quality of life in the United States;

(8) the Congress has enacted legislation that will bring to an end both the Federal Clean Water Act construction grants program and the Interstate Highway construction program, which have been the two major Federal commitments to the infrastructure of the last several decades; and

(9) the Nation is at a unique crossroads and must both reevaluate its spending priorities and create new financing mechanisms to address the needs of the future.

(b) The National Infrastructure Corporation created by this Act shall not be considered to be a provider of infrastructure services, but rather a technical and financial resource for the benefit of existing infrastructure providers at all levels. The purpose of this Act is to reaffirm the Federal commitment to investment in the Nation's public works infrastructure, in a manner that will stimulate greater investment by other levels of government and the private sector, by—

(1) creating a National Infrastructure Corporation to finance large, capital-intensive infrastructure projects;

(2) allowing for greater funding of small scale infrastructure projects by freeing capital from existing funding streams that heretofore went to finance these large infrastructure projects;

(3) providing for the leveraging of new and existing infrastructure spending;

(4) developing and promoting the use of innovative technology for public works;

(5) encouraging investment in all different types of public works projects in all parts of the country; and

(6) providing technical, legal, and financial assistance to infrastructure providers of all sizes to allow for the more efficient use of their resources.

(2) Action by a Director contrary to the prohibition contained in paragraph (1) shall be cause for removal of such Director pursuant to section 5(b)(3), but shall not impair or otherwise affect the validity of any otherwise lawful action by the Corporation in which the Director or officer participated.

(3) The prohibition contained in paragraph (1) shall not apply if the Director first advises the Board of Directors of the nature of the particular matter in which he proposes to participate and makes full disclosure of such financial interest, and the Board of Directors determines by majority vote that the financial interest is too remote or too inconsequential to affect the integrity of such Director's services for the Corporation in that matter. The Director involved shall not participate in such determination.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 221. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to authorize the use of rights-of-way along Federal-aid highways for the construction of transportation systems that will be part of the Federal-aid highway system; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CONSTRUCTION OF FEDERAL TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS ON FEDERAL RIGHT-OF WAYS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a bill to direct the Secretary of Transportation to issue regulations permitting the construction of magnetic levitation transportation systems along the interstate rights-of-way. Magnetic levitation, or maglev, is a frontier transportation technology. Based on the principles of magnetic attraction and repulsion, vehicles can be propelled in a guideway at speeds approaching 300 miles per hour. Maglev designs may also incorporate the latest in superconductivity technology.

Maglev prototypes have been built and tested. Japanese firms have built a variety of prototypes, spending $1 billion on development over the past 20 years. A German consortium has spent a similar amount. Both the Japanese and Germans are on track to commercialize this technology by the end of the century.

Although the most advanced maglev applications are the work of Japanese and German companies, maglev is an American invention. Scientists at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in Upton, NY, actually invented maglev in the mid-1960's. But in 1975, the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of Transportation considered all non-safety research and development superfluous and ended further maglev research. A shortsighted judgement, indeed! Meanwhile, the maglev industry in Japan and Germany has continued to develop.

There are several advantages to maglev systems that have attracted the attention of the Japanese and Germans. High speeds can be achieved at lower energy levels and with less pollution than airplanes or automobiles. In a report to the U.S. Department of Energy, the Center for Transportation Research at Argonne National Laboratory estimated that maglev trains would use one-fourth the energy of intercity aircraft or automobiles. In addition, noise pollution from maglev would be minimal compared to conventional rail and air transport, since maglev is propelled without engines or friction.

The frictionless propulsion of maglev vehicles has other advantages as well. No mechanical parts means no wear on the vehicle or the guideway.

This suggests operating costs for maglev would be relatively low. In addition, snow, sleet, and ice would not delay operations of maglev lines, since inclement weather would have little impact on the magnetic field propelling maglev. Higher speeds, better reliability and lower operating costs will likely made maglev the defining mode of transportation in the 21st century.

In the United States, serious consideration of maglev has begun on the State level. Nevada, California, Pennsylvania, and Florida have considered maglev systems, and the Coalition of Northeast Governors has investigated a proposal to apply maglev technology to the Boston—New York—Washington, DC, corridor. Other States considering high speed rail systems include Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, Texas, Missouri, New Mexico, Washington, and Georgia. The Federal Government should build on the work the States have begun, and sponsor a national effort to make maglev a part of the interstate transportation network.

If maglev is to be built in the United States, it will require Federal leadership. Maglev is 21st century technology. Because it has not been proven through actual use, the private sector in the United States has not assumed the risk of maglev development. The construction of an interstate maglev network must include the use of the highway rights-of-way. These rights-of-way will be the cornerstone of any new transportation system.

Innovation in our transportation system has been sponsored by the Federal Government since the beginning of the 19th century. The Federal Government supported the construction of 3,200 miles of canals through 1840. Federal land grants provided the key element to railroad companies pioneering the next great wave of transportation history. Recall that railroads were a great boon to American industrialization by providing fast, cheap movement of passengers and cargo. Once again in 1956, the Government undertook the greatest public works project in the history of the United States: building the Interstate Highway System. The latest revolution in transportation, air travel, has been assisted by Government support of airport construction and Government oversight of safety and air traffic.

However, our air routes are clearly overburdened and our highways choked with traffic. The United States has not built a major airport in more than a decade. Maglev provides an answer to our current transportation needs. But a strong Federal Government role will once again be necessary to develop a national maglev system.

The investigation into the feasibility of contructing maglev systems in the United States is underway. The Subcommittee on Water Resources, Transportation and Infrastructure, which I chair, held three hearings during the 100th Congress. In September 1988, the subcommittee announced the establishment of an advisory group—a magnificent group of distinguished scientists, economists, and businessmen which will report to me soon on the application of maglev to the Interstate Highway System. I intend to submit this report to the new administration. I also expect to introduce more detailed legislation when I have had the opportunity to review their report.

In the meantime, we should make sure that the new Secretary of Transportation gives high priority to maglev development. And I believe the introduction of maglev legislation on the first day of the 101st Congress will achieve this goal. The bill I introduce today would require the Secretary of Transportation to issue regulations to permit the use of the interstate highway rights-of-way for maglev. Guideways for maglev vehicles can be built alongside existing highways. The interstate rights-of-way are already in place and paid for. Use of this public land for maglev development should be part of a public-private partnership launching the next transportation revolution.

Only the Federal highway system contains the rights-of-way that are the critical foundation for a national maglev transportation system. The promulgation of regulations by the Secretary of Transportation to permit the use of the interstate rights-of-way for maglev development would be an important first step in our national effort.

I look forward to early action on this legislation, and to working with President Bush and his administration on this important national objective.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that—

(1) congestion of the Nation's highway system poses serious maintenance problems;

(2) the petroleum-based transportation modes that use the highways pose serious environmental problems, including air and noise pollution;

(3) the additional construction of magnetic levitation systems as part of the highways would relieve existing maintenance problems caused by automotive vehicle use and would relieve environmental hazards such as air and noise pollution; and

(4) the construction of magnetic levitation systems as part of the highways would provide significant opportunities for economic growth and development in various regions throughout the country.

RIGHTS-OF-WAY FOR MAGNETIC LEVITATION SYSTEMS

SEC. 2. Chapter 1 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 159. Rights-of-way for magnetic levitation systems

"The Secretary shall prescribe regulations under which the States will be allowed to use rights-of-way along Federal-aid highways for the construction of magnetic levitation systems as part of the Federal-aid highway system, with particular emphasis in the extent to which such systems affect all aspects of building and maintaining such highways.".

S. 222. A bill to encourage the development of energy plants at the mouth of coal mines, with a specific focus on the economically depressed Appalachian region, by improving the technologies for coal separation and power transmitting using superconductivity; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

COAL MINE MOUTH PLANT TECHNOLOGY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Coal Mine Mouth Plant Technology Improvement Act of 1989.

This is a bill to promote a new and promising technology for the clean use of coal. And, as we are all aware, by reducing emissions of sulfur dioxide, we can reduce the levels of acid precipitation that are plaguing our country's lakes, streams, and forests, as well as those of our neighbor to the north.

To accomplish these ends, this bill embraces two principles: First, the separation of coal from the impurities it contains in nature prior to combustion using powerful, superconducting magnets, and second, the use of these same superconductors for power transmission cables. This will allow us to locate our power generation plants where coal is mined and distribute power over these new transmission cables to where it is needed.

A system of mine mouth powerplants, as we call them, would have many advantages. It would reduce material handling and transportation costs associated with moving thousands of tons of coal per day across long distances—instead we would move electricity through underground transmission lines. The air emissions associated with these powerplants would be moved away from the urban centers where the power is used—this would reduce the cumulative effects of the many different sources of air pollution near our major urban areas. It is these areas that are not in compliance with Clean Air Act standards and are in need of relief. And even more important, such powerplants would provide good jobs in depressed coal mining areas.

Although this is a new bill, mine mouth power generation is by no means a new idea. In 1961 when I was an Assistant Secretary of Labor, my task was to create jobs in the economically depressed region of Appalachia. One logical approach was the development of mine mouth power generation. Jobs would be created in construction, operation, and maintenance of these plants and supporting infrastructure, and in the mines as well. Urban air pollution would be reduced by relocating emissions away from the cities.

Back then, transmission of electric power over long distances was not economically feasible on this scale. Substantial energy losses during transmission were simply unavoidable. This has changed with the recent advances in superconductivity, and mine mouth power generation is now within our grasp. New discoveries of high-temperature superconductors have opened up new opportunities. Each day new advances are made. Ideas for new applications include power storage and transmission, computer systems, supermagnets, magnetic levitation and propulsion systems, new medical analytical techniques, and even new toys for our children.

Superconductivity will allow power to be generated and stored during off-peak hours then transmitted to urban centers far from the point of generation with only minimal losses. Low-temperature superconductors have been used to develop prototype systems for coal separation and for power transmission. These systems can serve as the foundation for further development and application of high-temperature superconductivity to make this technology a commercially viable alternative for power generation and distribution.

To make this work for us, we need to invest in research and development of this technology. Such is the purpose of this bill. It would authorize funding for research and development of superconductivity in support of coal mine mouth power generation.

ACID RAIN

Prime Minister Mulroney's visit to the United States last spring focused our attention once again on the obstacles to acid rain legislation. We discussed possible solutions to the acid rain problem affecting both of our countries. One solution may be in newly emerging technologies and applications of superconductivity.

In 1979, I introduced the first and to date the only Federal legislation on acid rain to be enacted. This bill, the Acid Precipitation Act of 1980, set in motion a comprehensive 10-year research program that has now firmly established that emissions from coal-fired powerplants are a major contributor to acid rain. Last fall the Environment and Public Works Committee—of which I am ranking majority member—approved legislation to reduce acid rain as a part of comprehensive amendments to the Clean Air Act. We did not succeed in passing a bill in the 100th Congress, but in the 101st we will. Control of acid rain will be a top priority. But we should not lay all our hopes on one piece of legislation.

Acid rain is a complex and only partially understood phenomenon, and is open to many solutions. Among these, any approach that does not unduly threaten both coal and electric generation industries should be seriously considered.

Technology may come to our rescue. To reduce acid rain, we must reduce emission of sulfur into the atmosphere—sulfur dioxide and nitrous oxides are all too quickly converted to acid rain in our atmosphere. Most coal contains significant amounts of sulfur—mostly in the form of magnetically reactive iron pyrite. The idea behind coal separation is to remove sulfur before the coal enters the furnace. In addition, magnetic separation technology offers potential for gas emissions control using molecular gas separation techniques. In this application, gases are differentiated by molecular spins of individual molecules. Powerful superconducting magnets would be used to remove gases such as nitrous oxides from the emissions plume within the stack. By reducing sulfur and eliminating the nitrous oxide emissions, we can significantly reduce acid rain.

SUPERCONDUCTING COAL SEPARATION

The question arises: Why should we pursue development of a new precombustion clean coal technology when conventional coal cleaning techniques are available? The reasons are several.

First and foremost, our most commonly used pollution control technology for sulfur emissions, the flue gas scrubber, is extremely expensive. On a cost per ton of sulfur removed basis, scrubbers run between $350 and $500—at least twice the price of switching to low-sulfur fuels. If we clean coal before we burn it in a cost-effective manner, we can use any coal, not just low-sulfur coal. If we rely on the scrubber as our sole means of controlling sulfur emissions, then coal, our most abundant domestic energy resource, will be replaced by cheaper alternatives, such as natural gas. Scrubbers are very expensive and should be avoided if possible.

This brings us to coal separation. Conventional coal separation uses a wet process that requires supplemental energy to dry the coal before it can be fed into a boiler. The excess moisture resulting from the process also results in energy penalties during combustion.

Superconducting magnetic coal purification avoids these drawbacks. Coal is ground into a fine dry powder that is run through very powerful superconducting magnets. Magnetically reactive sulfur impurities are pulled to one side and separated from the cleaner fractions. The final product is a clean, dry coal power, ready for immediate introduction into the furnace. Dry processing saves valuable time during preparation, separation, and handling. Greater purity may also be achieved through rapid recycling through the magnetic field. Time required for a single cleaning cycle for a prototype unit has been a matter of minutes. As a consequence, multiple cleaning cycles can be run in much less time than necessary for a one-step conventional wet separation process. Estimates for operational costs are about 25 percent of those associated with conventional coal cleaning operations. And cleaner coal means lower plant cleaning and maintenance costs.

NEW SUPERCONDUCTING MATERIALS

This idea has been around for some time, but has not been aggressively pursued. This is due in large part to the large amounts of electricity required for generating such powerful magnetic fields. The new ceramic superconductors that filled our newspapers' headlines much of last year have changed this.

Magnets made with the new, high-temperature superconductors are much stronger than conventional magnets of comparable size, and require only a fraction of the power. Estimates of energy savings are around 75 percent.

Conventional superconductors require liquid helium to adequately cool the superconducting material. This requirement for extremely low temperatures has restricted these materials to application in a few specialized fields. The newer high-temperature materials can be adequately cooled using liquid nitrogen, at a fraction of the cost of liquid helium. In short, this new process holds the promise of being more efficient than conventional coal separation and cheaper than flue gas scrubbers. Quite a bargain.

The bill I am proposing today will allow us to bring this idea to fruition. So far the only existing prototype, located at Argonne National Laboratories, uses preexisting low-temperature superconducting magnets. Such a prototype will be needed to produce data on both operating costs and cleaning efficiencies—information vitally necessary for the commercialization of any new technology of this sort.

Only sustained research and development will allow us to take advantage of this new superconducting technology, overcome technical and safety problems, and ensure the timely availability of this much-needed technology. The bill I am introducing today would authorize $4 million per year for research and development of magnetic coal separation and magnetic emissions controls, with the ultimate aim of seeing it used at coal-fired mine-mouth powerplants across the country.

The Congress will enact acid rain legislation. It may happen this year, or perhaps next year, but it will happen. We must strive to see that the legislation we do enact deals with all facets of the problem. I hope my colleagues will see the wisdom of using this promising technology to reduce, or more optimistically, eliminate acid rain at its source, and will support this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. DODD, and Mr. KASTEN);

S. 223. A bill to establish a grant program for research, treatment and public education with respect to Lyme disease; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

COMPREHENSIVE LYME DISEASE ACT OF 1989

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today at the outset of the 101st Congress, to introduce the Comprehensive Lyme Disease Act of 1989, designed to control the spread of Lyme disease. My colleague from New York, Congressman HOCHBRUECKER, has sponsored this measure in the House of Representatives. Allow me to provide Senators with some background on the disease, and why I believe this measure is worthy of their full support. Although Lyme disease was first officially reported just 14 years ago in Lyme, CT thus, its curious appellation—it has fast become the most common tick-borne disease in the United States. If treated early, the disease can be cured by antibiotic therapy; however, early diagnosis is often thwarted by Lyme disease's pernicious resemblance to the flu and other much less dangerous ailments. Indeed, without early treatment, a victim of Lyme disease can expect meningitis, heart disease, encephalitis, paralysis or even, albeit in rare cases, death.

The Centers for Disease Control [CDC] report 6,000 cases of Lyme disease through 1986; however, the CDC indicates that because the existence of the disease is not widely known, there have been many more cases which have gone unreported, undiagnosed, and worse, untreated. Further, although the CDC has no hard data on the number of cases of Lyme disease in 1987 and 1988, the CDC does report a precipitous rise in the number of cases in the last 2 years.

My own State of New York, which has been the hardest hit, tells the tale. The number of cases reported to the New York State Department of Health in 1988 increased threefold over the number reported in 1987. In 1987, 877 cases were reported in NYS. As of December 16, 1988, 2,678 cases had been reported in 1988 alone—well over one-third of all cases reported to the CDC through 1986 in 1 year, indeed, in one State. Yet, Mr. President, this is not an epidemic confined to my home State—far from it. Lyme disease has now been reported in over 30 States. Clearly, action must be taken to prevent this menace from spreading even further.

The measure I introduce today expands upon a measure I introduced in the 100th Congress. Specifically, the Comprehensive Lyme Disease Act of 1989 will provide $2.5 million per year over 3 years in grants to public and nonprofit private entities for Lyme disease research and treatment programs. Further, this legislation will provide $1 million per year in grants to public and nonprofit private entities to assist in providing information on the diagnosis, prevention, and control of Lyme disease.

Last year, Congress passed, and the President signed, a resolution I sponsored designating July 24-30, 1988 "Lyme Disease Awareness Week." I was pleased that my colleagues joined with me in support of that measure; however, it will take more than merely a week of awareness to stem the growth of Lyme disease and halt the suffering it brings. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join with Senator D'AMATO, DODD, and KASTEN in support of this measure, which will provide real help.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 223

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"(2) For the purpose of carrying out programs of public education under subsection (a), there is authorized to be appropriated $1,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990 through 1992.".

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to reaffirm my support for combating Lyme disease as an original cosponsor of legislation introduced by my colleague, Senator MOYNIHAN. This legislation is similar to a bill that was introduced last year, S. 2466. While that bill died upon adjournment, I remain hopeful that Congress will pass this bill in the 101st Congress, making funds available to fight this disease.

The bill we are introducing today will establish a program of grants for the research, treatment, and public education with respect to Lyme disease. I feel that the passage of this bill will facilitate a greater recognition of the symptoms of Lyme disease among the general public, and hopefully, will lead to a cure.

This debilitating disease was first diagnosed 14 years ago in Lyme, CT. A tick-borne disease, Lyme disease has spread to 34 States from coast to coast and has already reached epidemic proportions in some States. In my home State of New York, 877 cases were reported to the department of health in 1987. For 1988, the number of new cases is expected to climb past 2,600. Through 1987, more than 8,500 cases of Lyme disease had been reported to the Centers for Disease Control nationwide. Preliminary estimates from the CDC put the number of new cases for 1988 at 5,700 nationwide.

The symptoms of Lyme disease are often hard to place due to their close resemblance to a host of other ailments. The early symptoms of Lyme disease often include a rash at the site of the tick bite accompanied by a fever, headaches, stiff neck, and muscle aches. Often, these relatively common physical symptoms are ignored by persons who feel that nothing is seriously wrong. However, if left untreated, Lyme disease can cause meningitis, heart disease, paralysis, encephalitis, arthritis, and in extremely rare cases, it may cause death. The real tragedy is that treated early, Lyme disease is easily cured. It is obvious that something must be done to stem the spread of this public health threat.

I believe that this new legislation will help greatly to curtail Lyme disease. Our bill will provide $2.5 million in grants each year through fiscal year 1992 to assist in the diagnosis, prevention, and control of Lyme disease. This will help doctors and other health care professionals to recognize and treat the symptoms of this disease. Also, $1 million each year through fiscal year 1992 will be made available to inform the public about the threat of Lyme disease, and the means to prevent it. Mr. President, I support this bill wholeheartedly, and I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring it.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 224. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to waive, for 5 years, the 24-month waiting period for Medicare eligibility on the basis of a disability in the case of individuals with acquired immune deficiency syndrome [AIDS], and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

WAIVER OF MEDICARE BENEFITS WAITING PERIOD FOR AIDS

Mr. MOYINHAN. Mr. President, I rise at the outset of the 101st Congress to introduce legislation to ease the suffering of those battling the acquired immune deficiency syndrome, more commonly known as AIDS.

Despite recent actions taken at the Federal level, it is regrettably clear that the fight against AIDS is only beginning. AIDS poses a threat to all sectors of our society: men and women, homosexuals and heterosexuals, adults and children. For each of these groups, the number of AIDS-related deaths is growing at an astounding rate. Two years ago, when I first introduced this legislation, I cited the following figures:

According to the Centers for Disease Control [CDC], as of December 31, 1986, there have been 29,003 cases of full-blown AIDS reported in this country and of those 29,003, 16,301 have died.

Well, Mr. President, I have a sobering fact to report: in the first 11 months of 1988 alone, there were more new AIDS cases reported to the CDC as in all years through 1986 combined. Further, the death toll has risen 270 percent in just 2 years. To wit, as of December 1988, more than 80,000 cases of AIDS were reported to the CDC, over 30,000 of them in 1988 alone. Of those 80,000 people, some 45,000 died due to the ravages of opportunistic diseases such as pneumonia and Kaposi's sarcoma, which prey upon immune systems weakened by the AIDS virus. The city of New York has been hardest hit. One in five of all people who have tested HIV-positive call the New York City area home.

We responded to this crisis in a variety of ways last year. President Reagan's Commission on AIDS issued its final report, replete with recommendations for constructive action. We passed the Health Omnibus Extension of 1988 (Public Law 100-607), title II of which provided increased funding for AIDS research, education, and prevention. We also established a National Commission on Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, charged with "promoting a national consensus on policy concerning acquired immune deficiency syndrome and of studying and making recommendations for a consistent national policy concerning AIDS."

Despite these actions, we have yet to solve a fundamental problem confronting those with the syndrome; namely, the lack of adequate health insurance coverage for disabled AIDS patients.

AIDS patients face two barriers when trying to obtain health coverage. First, they face discrimination. More and more, health insurance companies deny benefits to those who have tested HIV-positive. This fact should not surprise, for it has been well documented. Senators may recall that several months ago, on the CBS program "60 Minutes," Harry Reasoner chronicled the difficulties AIDS patients face in obtaining, and, in many cases, retaining health care coverage. Many who have tested HIV-positive have been socked with enormous premium increases, forcing them to give up health insurance coverage entirely.

Second, AIDS patients who have become disabled, like other disabled citizens, must wait 29 months after the onset of a disabling condition before becoming eligible for Medicare coverage. Under the Social Security Disability Insurance [DI] Program, a disabled individual may begin to receive cash benefits 5 months after the onset of a disabling condition. Two years—24 months—after the 5-month waiting period for cash benefits expires, if the disability continues, the individual becomes eligible for Medicare. The Medicare waiting period was established primarily to ensure that Medicare does not overlap with the disabled individual's private health insurance coverage.

Unlike most other DI beneficiaries, however, the AIDS patient simply cannot wait 29 months—almost 2½ years—for health insurance coverage after the onset of opportunistic diseases like Kaposi's sarcoma or pneumonia. The average life expectancy of an AIDS patient, from the date of diagnosis, is between 11.2 and 13 months. In short, Mr. President, the chances of an AIDS patient surviving the waiting period are slim. Given that AIDS patients are increasingly denied private health insurance coverage, we offer them little choice but to impoverish themselves by spending down to the level of Medicaid eligibility in order to obtain the coverage they need.

The legislation I introduce today would waive the 24-month Medicare waiting period for DI beneficiaries with AIDS. Justice and compassion demand that we do this. Justice because these individuals have worked and paid Social Security taxes, thus insuring themselves, indeed, entitling themselves to Medicare benefits before they die. Compassion because there is to date no cure for this disease. AIDS patients are condemned to death with little hope. The least we can do is care for those so cruelly stricken, without requiring them to become paupers in their final days.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in sponsoring this important legislation. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 225. A bill to amend title XIX of the Public Health Service Act to provide for the construction of community health centers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 226. A bill to amend title XVI and title XIX of the Social Security Act to provide for improved mental health care for the chronically mentally ill and the homeless mentally ill, to prevent homelessness among the chronically mentally ill, and for other purposes.

COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH CENTERS CONSTRUCTION ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, framed on the wall on my Third Avenue street office in New York City is a pen President Kennedy presented to me when he signed the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963. The pen is a reminder of our start back then to move the mentally ill out of large State hospitals and into the community. We made a promise in 1963 to do this.

But the homeless mentally ill, 25 to 50 percent of the homeless population living on our city streets, are living proof that promise was not kept. For this reason, as we begin the 101st Congress, I am introducing today the Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1989 and the Community Mental Health Services and Homelessness Prevention Act of 1989. These measures will fulfill the promise we made 25 years ago to treat the mentally ill within the community and not in large, impersonal hospitals.

The idea of moving mentally ill patients out of hospitals and into the community — deinstitutionalization — has long had wide support, going back to the late 1950's and early 1960's. Pressure to reform our treatment of the mentally ill began to build after the establishment of the Joint Commission on Mental Illness and Health under President Eisenhower in 1955. At the time the Joint Commission began its work three out of every four persons treated for mental illness were inpatients, and there were approximately 559,000 residents in State mental hospitals. In New York alone, the resident population of the State's mental hospitals had reached an all-time high of 93,600 persons, double that of a generation earlier.

In 1961, the Joint Commission published its report, "Action for Mental Health." Recommendations included a change in policy—take the mentally ill out of psychiatric hospitals and care for them in their communities, and provide Federal financial assistance to the States to see this change through.

Political support for these changes was already developing. The year before, in 1960, the Democratic Party endorsed the Joint Commission's preliminary findings in its platform:

> Mental patients fill more than half the hospital beds in the country today. We will provide greatly increased federal support for psychiatric research and training, and community mental health programs to bring back thousands of hospitalized mentally ill to full and useful lives in the community.

President Kennedy made good on his party's commitment. He called for the development of a Federal program to improve care for the mentally ill, and in 1962 established an Interagency Task Force on Mental Health to respond to the Joint Commission's recommendations. As a young special assistant to Secretary of Labor Goldberg in President Kennedy's administration, it fell to me to draft the report of the President's Interagency Task Force on Mental Health.

We produced recommendations in 1962. We said we needed a system of community mental health centers to care for the mentally ill—500 such centers by 1970—and that Federal funding was needed to get the centers going. The Federal Government would shoulder part of the responsibility of funding construction of the new centers, initial staffing, research in the field of mental illness and education of mental health professionals. These recommendations became the basis for President Kennedy's February 5, 1963, special message to Congress on mental health in which he called for the "inauguration of a wholly new emphasis and approach to the care of the mentally ill," the centerpiece of which was to be "comprehensive community care." The President further noted that:

> Merely pouring Federal funds into a continuation of the outmoded type of institutional care which now prevails would make little difference. We need a new type of health facility, one which will return mental health care to the main stream of American medicine, and at the same time upgrade mental health services.

Congress responded to the President's message, and on October 31, 1963, a little over 3 weeks before his death, President Kennedy signed the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963 into law. Title II of the act authorized $150 million for grants to the States for the construction of community mental health centers. At this time, the number of residents in public mental hospitals had declined from 559,000 in 1955 to 504,000.

Why were we so hopeful? In part, the discovery of psychotropic drugs to control mental illness could enable many patients to lead their lives outside the hospitals where they had been warehoused.

However, drugs alone would not suffice: Proper care had to be provided to the mentally ill in the community. What patients received under one roof in the State hospitals—housing, food, showers, laundry, medications, and personal safety—needed to be provided by a variety of community organizations. Drugs could enable a mentally ill person to leave the hospital but only so long as that medication was taken regularly. Someone had to keep track of these patients to ensure they took their medication, paid their rent and if they were employed, showed up at work. Community mental health center staff could perform this function and provide medical and psychological counseling. The presence of so many homeless mentally ill on our streets may be traced directly to our failure to fully provide these services.

For example, in 1962, I said we needed to build 2,000 community mental health centers by 1980 to provide services all over the Nation—that meant one center for every 100,000 citizens. Yet fewer than half the required number of centers were built. Between 1965 and 1977, 4.7 million patients were released from the Nation's mental hospitals. At least 25 percent of those discharged were eventually readmitted, either in that same year or a subsequent one. The other 75 percent were released into the community and many comprise our homeless population today.

Why? Because the necessary counseling and services were not available in the community. Hence, many who might have led a life outside an institution returned in search of help they could not find in their communities; many others are found wandering our city streets.

For all those released during those years, approximately 800 mental health centers were built around the country. Not even half the amount we thought necessary in 1962.

A prime example is New York City. In New York State alone, from 1965–77, 126,000 patients were discharged from State mental hospitals to the New York City area. To accommodate these patients, New York City should have 73 community mental health centers, instead we only have 14. New York State should have 170 centers, but we only have 43.

I also said we needed to train three times the existing number of doctors, nurses, social workers, and psychologists and psychiatrists by 1980 to staff the new centers. We didn't meet that goal, either. The number of psychiatrists—needed to prescribe and monitor medication for the severely mentally ill—did not even double. And over the years, psychiatrists as a percentage of center staffs declined.

Clearly, we never gave the community mental health centers the stable Federal funding necessary to match our expectations. Indeed, in 1981 the Mental Health Systems Act, the successor to the Community Mental Health Center Program, was repealed, and replaced by the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Block Grant, which specifically prohibited the use of these funds for the construction of community mental health centers. Nor did the States step in to fill this funding void. Consequently, many necessary services were never funded. Now the homeless mentally ill have become a national shame, pointed to by the Soviets as an example of how our system has failed. It is time we turned to this issue once again and complete the project we began 25 years ago. That is what the bills I introduce today are all about.

COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH CENTER CONSTRUCTION GRANTS

First, the Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act reestablishes community mental health center construction grants. Such a program will enable us to build or renovate the facilities that provide the mentally ill with the services necessary to enable them to function in their communities. Federal support for the staffing and maintenance of these community mental health centers is also provided. Because much of our homeless problem was caused by our failure to build community centers sufficient to care for those released from our mental hospitals, the legislation also requires that at least half the services to be provided through these centers target the homeless mentally ill population.

MEDICAID COVERAGE OF HOME AND COMMUNITY-BASED SERVICE

Second, unless a specific waiver is granted, Medicaid pays only for hospital or inpatient care for the mentally ill, not outpatient and rehabilitative services offered in a community setting. This is both needlessly expensive and inefficient, and creates an improper bias in favor of large institutional care over community based services. If we are to provide effective mental health services within the community, especially to the poor and homeless, it is absolutely critical that Medicaid coverage be expanded on a universal basis to cover a wide range of home and community based mental health and social and rehabilitative services. The Community Mental Health Services and Homelessness Prevention Act would do just that.

INCOME SUPPORT FOR THE CHRONICALLY MENTALLY ILL

Mental illness is often episodic. Consequently, the mentally ill may be temporarily hospitalized for varying periods of time. Unfortunately, if one is hospitalized for more than 30 days, a not unusual occurrence for the chronically mentally ill, one loses his SSI benefits. Then, when the patient is released to the community, he has no income, may lose his home and become homeless. Current law must be changed to eliminate these artificial restrictions that deny benefits to the mentally ill. The Community Mental Health Services and Homelessness Prevention Act does so by extending SSI coverage for the first 6 months of hospitalization.

It is also necessary to eliminate delays in determining disability for purposes of SSI payments. This legislation establishes a presumption of disability for the chronically mentally ill, including those about to be discharged from an institution, thus eliminating delays that can destroy their prospects for survival in the community.

Because the mentally ill need not—indeed, should not—be relegated to institutions that cut them off from their home communities, we are dutybound to give them the care and resources they need to live in their communities. The tragedy of many of today's mentally ill homeless is that we know how to make their lives better—and we began in 1963 to do just that. But we failed.

Now we have recognized our responsibility to begin again—so that this senseless situation will not be repeated.

I ask unanimous consent that my statement and the full texts of the two bills be entered in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) in 1955 Congress established a Joint Commission on Mental Illness and Health to provide an "objective, thorough, and nationwide analysis and reevaluation of the human and economic problems of mental illness and at that time three out of every four individuals treated for mental illness were institutionalized with a total of some 559,000 individuals in public mental hospitals;

(2) in 1960, the Joint Commission report, "Action for Mental Health" recommended that the mentally ill be cared for in the community, and that Federal financial assistance be provided to the States to accomplish this;

(3) in 1962, President Kennedy established the Interagency Task Force on Mental Health, and the Task Force recommended that Federal aid should be provided to assist States in constructing a nationwide network of such centers;

(4) in 1963 the Kennedy Administration recommended before Congress that a goal, by 1980, of one community mental health center per 100,000 individuals, or 2,000 such centers nationwide, be established, and the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963 began the Federal commitment to build this nationwide network of community mental health centers;

(5) in 1967 Congress specifically reaffirmed the goal of having a nationwide network consisting of 2,000 community mental health centers in place by 1980;

(6) the mentally ill were to receive treatment, not from large institutions, but from community mental health centers to be built with the assistance provided as a result of the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963 and subsequent legislation;

(7) however, the total number of community mental health centers, which could provide mental health services in the community, that have been built with the help of the Federal government up to the present time is only 768;

(8) even so, from 1963 to 1980 the number of residents in public mental hospitals declined from 505,000 in 1963 to 150,000 in 1980; and

(9) even so, as a result of the Federal government's failure to meet its commitment to build 2,000 community mental health centers by 1980, many of the nation's mentally ill individuals cannot be adequately cared for in the community, and today such individuals comprise at least ⅓ of the homeless population of the United States.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) restate the commitment began by the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963 to build one community mental health center for every 100,000 individuals;

(2) provide the funding necessary to meet the commitment to build a community mental health center for every 100,000 Americans; and

(3) provide mental health services to homeless mentally ill and chronically mentally ill individuals.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 227. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to exempt certain small rural hospitals from the prospective payment system; to the Committee on Finance.

EXEMPTION OF SMALL RURAL HOSPITALS FROM PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT SYSTEM

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, last year I sponsored legislation to encourage physician training in rural hospital settings. Although manpower concerns are of particular interest to these institutions, the current reimbursement system has created a far greater danger to their survivability. Rural hospitals are under stress for a number of reasons.

First, rural hospitals are generally smaller than their urban and suburban counterparts and have fewer patients within each diagnosis-related group [DRG]. One or two exceptionally costly cases can quickly skew a facility's average cost. As a consequence, there is often very little relationship between the cost of providing care in a rural hospital and the Medicare DRG payments.

Second, rural hospitals generally experience both lower occupancy rates and more variation in occupancy than urban and suburban facilities. Discharging or admitting two or three patients can dramatically affect the occupancy rate of a rural hospital. In contrast, the occupancy rates of urban and suburban hospitals remain relatively constant. Moreover, rural hospitals do not have the flexibility to adjust staffing and other expenses to reflect sudden or radical changes in occupancy. The PPS does not reflect these types of variations.

The demographic trends show a population in continued decline with a high proportion of elderly persons, and a dwindling tax base that is a direct result of declining industries such as farming. The rural hospital must care for this aging population through medical assistance programs—Medicare and Medicaid—and limited support from local government. Meanwhile pressures continue to mount—while overall utilization and declining services for the elderly are increasing. The rural elderly like their urban counterparts are living longer, experiencing acute illnesses that require longer hospital stays. Unfortunately, reimbursement under Medicare for these longer stays is insufficient. Indeed, many hospitals are closing their doors and communities are being left without health care services. This is becoming an intolerable situation.

Our current system for reimbursing hospitals is predicated on the average cost of treating different types of patients; however, PPS is unable to adequately reflect the actual costs incurred by rural hospitals. Therefore, I am proposing the following:

First. Rural hospitals with less than 150 beds can be exempt from PPS. However, once a hospital chooses to be exempt from PPS, it cannot return to PPS.

Second. In computing payments to those rural hospitals exempt from the PPS, the Secretary will compute the hospital's target amount utilizing the first complete cost reporting period beginning on or after June 1, 1986.

Third. The target amount will be increased by the applicable percentage increase specified by law for hospitals exempt from the PPS.

This legislation is intended to provide rural institutions with a reimbursement methodology that will reflect more accurately their individual circumstances.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXEMPTION FROM THE PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT SYSTEM FOR CERTAIN SMALL RURAL HOSPITALS.

(a) IN GENERAL—Section 1886(d)(1)(B) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ww(d)(1)(B)) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" in clause (iii);

(2) by redesignating clause (iv) as clause (v); and

(3) by inserting after clause (iii) the following new clause:

"(iv) a hospital that has less than 150 beds and is located in a rural area (as defined in section 1886(d)(2)(D), or".

(b) TARGET AMOUNT.—In determining the initial target amount under section 1886(b)(3)(A)(i) for hospitals that have less than 150 beds and that are located in a rural area (as defined in section 1886(d)(2)(D) the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall compute the target amount for such hospitals utilizing the first complete cost reporting beginning on or after June 1, 1986.

(c) Effective Date.—The provisions of this section shall become effective with respect to payments made on or after January 1, 1990.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 228. A bill entitled the "Intravenous Substance Abuse and AIDS Prevention Act of 1989"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

INTRAVENOUS SUBSTANCE ABUSE AND AIDS PREVENTION ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today, at the outset of the 101st Congress, to introduce the Intravenous Substance Abuse and AIDS Prevention Act of 1989.

Since June 1981, over 45,000 people have died of AIDS. More than 80,000 cases of AIDS have been reported to the Centers for Disease Control [CDC], and of these, 20 percent have resulted from intravenous drug use. According to the CDC, over half of all intravenous drug users are infected with the AIDS virus.

It is not only the intravenous drug users themselves that are contracting AIDS. They are spreading AIDS to their sexual partners and children. All these people will die. More than half of all AIDS-related deaths in New York City occur among intravenous drug users, of whom New York has a population of 250,000. Nationwide, over 1,000 children have contracted the AIDS virus from their mother, and the number born with the disease is growing daily. Two percent of children born in the Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn, NY, test positive for HIV. Half will die.

The epidemic of AIDS has been in part fueled by a second, equally virulent epidemic: drug abuse. Together, both epidemics have placed a shadow over our future. Young people everywhere are endangered, and dying, but, most viciously, the young people of the inner cities. The violence associated with drug use and the deaths associated with AIDS could reshape American society. Single parent families could become no-parent families: a devastating prospect already taking shape.

Though the threat of AIDS may be frightening some users away from heroin, there has been no measurable decline in use. According to the New York State Division of Substance Abuse Services the high produced by the stimulant drug crack leads to such feelings of paranoia and irritability that crack addicts take heroin to reduce the sensation. One drug is being used to kill the pain caused by another drug, leading inevitably to more pain.

And in shooting galleries in our Nation's cities, young addicts, male and female alike, trade sex for drugs, passing the diseases of addiction and AIDS from victim to victim in a deadly cycle. In Covenant House, a New York City home for homeless youth, 10 percent of 19- and 20-year-olds test positive for AIDS, the result of this tragic intersection of drug use, prostitution, and homelessness.

It is an essential fact that most users of the hardest drugs, like heroin and crack, are not easily frightened. They do not do what they do for pleasure. Lawyers do not shoot heroin at parties. David Musto, an expert on drug abuse at the Yale Medical School, argues that we now have a two-tier system of drug abuse. The middle and upper classes are being frightened away from the use of hard drugs, which is becoming concentrated among the urban poor. In 1987, over 50 percent of all callers to the National Cocaine Helpline were unemployed. And if inner-city addicts are willing to risk AIDS and the death of their children, they will risk jail. They will certainly risk losing a student loan. What they need instead is help.

Just last October, in an effort to provide that help, Congress enacted the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. Senator NUNN and I led the Democratic effort in the Senate to produce that bill: The first major Federal drug law that emphasized reducing the demand for drugs through treatment and education. For the first time, it committed the Federal Government, in principle, to providing substance abuse treatment on request, so that addicts who want help get help. It authorized over $1 billion in new funds for treatment in fiscal year 1989 and sets aside half for intravenous drug users, thus targeting those drug users most at risk of contracting AIDS. Unfortunately, Congress was only able to appropriate a fraction of the funds the drug bill authorized. Much more needs to be done.

The Intravenous Drug Abuse and AIDS Prevention Act of 1989 will complement the drug bill by focusing on the population most cruelly hit by the AIDS and drug epidemics. It is similar to legislation I introduced in the last session along with Congressman RANGEL in the House of Representatives. As chairman of the House Select Committee on Narcotics, Congressman RANGEL has led the long and difficult battle against drug abuse. I have been privileged to work with him in the past and look forward to doing so again as we try to see this bill through.

This bill attacks the problem in three ways. First, it will authorize $200 million in grants to nonprofit organizations for treatment services for intravenous drug users. Seventy-five percent of these funds will go to areas with a high incidence of drug use and AIDS. The remaining 25 percent will go to areas which have a low incidence of AIDS but a high incidence of drug use and, thus, the potential for widespread AIDS infection.

Second, this bill will authorize $100 million for demonstration projects to reduce the incidence of AIDS in infants and to care for infants infected with AIDS. In 1987, we included in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (Public Law 100-203) a provision I sponsored requiring the Department of Health and Human Services to conduct a study of foster care children who have AIDS. This study will be completed any day. When we have the facts, we will need the funds to act upon them, to help these children and the foster parents who have opened their homes to them. This bill provides them. The funds provided by this legislation could be used to provide prenatal care for women who are intravenous drug users; services to parents of infected children; foster care for children with AIDS; counseling, education, and testing services for women at risk of contracting AIDS—by virtue of drug use or sexual contact with drug users—and pregnant women already infected with the AIDS virus.

Third, it will authorize $100 million for grants for outreach and counseling programs to prevent intravenous drug use among minority groups. We have appropriated some funds for this purpose but not nearly enough. More than 80 percent of AIDS cases attributable to intravenous substance abuse, heterosexual, and perinatal transmission have occurred among blacks and Hispanics.

Our responsibility is clear: If we don't inform our citizens of the dangers of drug use in and of itself and its direct link to the spread of AIDS, we fail in our duty as public officials and fellow human beings. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that the text be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 228

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Intravenous Substance Abuse and AIDS Prevention Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that:

(1) More than 80,000 cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) have been reported to the Centers for Disease Control, and more than 365,000 such cases are expected to be reported by 1992;

(2) intravenous substance abusers are the second largest group in the United States that has AIDS. Of the cases of AIDS reported to the Centers for Disease Control, 20 percent are attributable to intravenous substance abuse and such abuse was a risk factor in an additional 7 percent;

(3) HIV (the virus causing AIDS) is transmitted among intravenous substance abusers through the use and sharing of needles, syringes, swabs, or other drug-related implements that are contaminated with blood infected with HIV;

(4) HIV can be transmitted rapidly among intravenous substance abusers in a given geographic area;

(5) once a group of intravenous substance abusers becomes exposed to HIV, such abusers become the primary source for heterosexual transmission and perinatal transmission of HIV;

(6) a disproportionate number of cases of AIDS has occurred among members of minority groups;

(7) more than 80 percent of those infected with AIDS because of intravenous substance abuse are Black or Hispanic and more than 80 percent of heterosexual and perinatal transmission AIDS cases related to such drug abuse have occurred among Blacks and Hispanics;

(8) more than 50 percent of women in the United States who have AIDS developed the disease as a result of intravenous substance abuse;

(9) the second largest group of women who are at risk with respect to infection with HIV are women who are the sexual partners of intravenous substance abusers;

(10) most women with AIDS are in their child-bearing years, and women infected with HIV may transmit HIV to any of their children born subsequent to the mother's infection;

(11) as of December 26, 1988, the Centers for Disease Control reported a cumulative total of 1,105 cases of AIDS among children under 5 years of age at the time of diagnosis;

(12) approximately 80 percent of children with AIDS who were infected through perinatal transmission were children of intravenous substance abusers;

(13) preventing or reducing the transmission of HIV among intravenous substance abusers is essential with respect to preventing or reducing the heterosexual and perinatal transmission of HIV in the United States; and

(14) to reduce and prevent the spread of AIDS related to intravenous substance abuse, additional Federal leadership and support is urgently needed to expand treatment for intravenous substance abusers, to promote efforts to prevent pediatric AIDS and provide better care for infants with AIDS, and to establish effective school and community-based AIDS prevention programs.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 229. A bill to amend chapter 44 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit the manufacture, transfer, or importation of .25 caliber and .32 caliber ammunition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VIOLENT CRIME PREVENTION ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Violent Crime Protection Act of 1989 to ban the manufacture, importation, and sale of .25 and .32 caliber handgun ammunition. I do so because handgun control has not worked. The Gun Control Act of 1968 has been evaded by foreign imports. On top of that, the Firearms Owners Protection Act of 1986 repealed provisions of the Gun Control Act restricting the sale of guns. At the same time, on average one citizen of Washington, DC, was murdered for each day of 1988. Most were victims of handguns.

In 1986, Congress passed the first legislation in history forbidding the manufacture, import, and sale of a particuar type of handgun ammunition—the so-called cop-killer bullet. This round, jacketed with tungsten alloys, steel, brass, or any number of other metals, has been demonstrated to penetrate no less than four police flak jackets and an additional five Los Angeles County phone books at one time. In 1982, the New York Police Benevolent Association came to me and Representative BIAGGI and asked us to do something about this. The result was the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act, which we introduced in 1982, 1983, and for the last time during the 99th Congress. In the end, with the tacit support of the National Rifle Association the measure passed the Congress and was signed by President Reagan as Public Law 99-408 on August 28, 1986.

Two years ago, in the aftermath of our legislation banning armor piercing bullets, I introduced this measure as S. 25. I had realized that there were other kinds of cop-killer bullets. Of handguns discharged at New York City police officers between 1975 and 1985, one quarter were .25 or .32 caliber. Last Friday morning, as President Bush was preparing to be sworn in, two New York City police officers, William Gunn and Louis Rango, were shot by a murder suspect. Officer Gunn is now clinging to life with a .25 caliber bullet wound in his head.

The .25 and .32 caliber weapons are overwhelmingly the choice of criminals. They have no sporting purpose. They are just used to kill people. They are easy to conceal. So easy, in fact, even a child can do it. The day before yesterday in Fairfax County, VA, an 8-year-old boy shot his 6-year-old sister to death. Deliberately, with a .32 caliber handgun, after she chided him for playing with the gun in a family bedroom. And in New York City, on January 11, a 5-year-old brought a .25 caliber pistol to kindergarten. "Pistol Packin' Peewee," the New York Post called him.

When S. 25 was introduced in the last Congress, it was referred to the Judiciary Committee. It received little support in this body, and not enough from police and gun-control advocates. It did not even get a hearing. If we do not do something like this in the 101st Congress, children will go on killing children.

We will never get a handle on handguns until we can do something about bullets. Today there are over 60 million handguns in this country, a number which is likely to climb to 100 million by the turn of this century. A handgun is a simple machine, fully developed before the Civil War with clip-loading the only basic variation since. The average "Saturday Night Special" has some 40 parts. The Model T, on the other hand, had 5,000 parts and the antiques still operate today. Unless it wears out, which is surely rare, or seizes up with rust, which is easily prevented, a handgun has a near infinite lifetime. Let us say the United States has something like a two-century supply of firearms.

On the other hand we have about a 7-year supply of handgun ammunition. Each year 4 billion rounds of ammunition are manufactured and approximately 2 billion rounds are consumed. If ammunition has a shelf life of 5 to 10 years this gives us around a 7-year supply of ammunition. But mind you, my statistics are somewhat sketchy. Recordkeeping has always been restricted and following passage of the Firearms Owners Protection Act it is now nonexistent for ammunition sale. With only 7 years of ammunition out there at any one time, and 60 million handguns, is it not a more realistic hypothesis to control ammunition as a means of controlling violent crime than it is to control handguns?

If we ban the manufacture and importation of the ammunition for these weapons, and here I speak specifically of .25 and .32 caliber ammunition, in 5 or 7 or 10 years anywhere from 10 to 20 percent of the crime guns in the United States will be out of commission. Will there be others? Of course. But President Reagan survived a .22 caliber wound. President Ford very likely would not have survived the .32 round that was fired at him. President McKinley, Huey Long, and George Moscone did not. The .22 is too small to be automatically deadly, the .45 too large to conceal—and Alaskan guides need them for bear attacks. In between we could just save a couple of thousand lives a year.

Would this end the problem, the awful problem of handgun killings? No. It might just reduce it. And it might just save the lives of a few children. If there is a tradeoff to be made here, I will veer to the side of life. That is a tradeoff I am willing to make. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that the text be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 230. A bill to establish a remedial education treatment program as an alternative to criminal incarceration for first-time youthful defendants who are determined to be learning disabled as a means of reducing recidivism rates among such defendants; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

LEARNING DISABLED YOUTHFUL OFFENDER REHABILITATION ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Learning Disabled Youthful Offender Act of 1989. The purpose of this bill is to provide remedial education and treatment as an alternative to imprisonment for first-time youthful offenders who have a learning disability. Such treatment can be anticipated to reduce the presently high recidivism rates among these individuals.

Little attention has been paid to this subject at the Federal level. But this just may start to change. Last year I introduced a bill in the Senate, S. 1332, which would provide funds to local district attorneys to offer alternatives to juveniles with learning disabilities who find themselves in trouble with the law. We did not succeed in enacting this legislation in the 100th Congress, but with the introduction of this bill in the 101st we begin the effort again.

The problem of juvenile delinquency is not a new one to American society. As early as the mid-19th century, street gangs plagued our urban areas. For most of that century, we treated young offenders rather harshly, trying them in the same courts as their adult counterparts. That changed in the late 19th century when States began to establish separate courts and procedures for juveniles in an effort to rehabilitate rather then merely punish them. In 1872, Massachusetts became the first State to establish separate court sessions for children and by 1925, all but two States had such juvenile courts.

The standard practice in these courts was much less formal than in adult courts. Often, the judge would hear testimony regarding the circumstances of the crime and the child's background and family life in private and make a decision based on this information.

New York State began its own separate system for dealing with juveniles in 1903 when it began to try children in a separate chamber, commonly known as the children's court. In 1922, the State legislature established a separate judicial system for children less than 16 years of age. This court's primary goal was to keep children out of jail, not to punish them but to rehabilitate them.

In 1962, New York State created the family court system, which was devoted to deciding the fate of children who had to be taken from abusive environments, as well as children over whom their parents had lost control. Just as the State can use the family court system to protect children from their environment, parents can also use the system to ensure that the State provides their children with the services to which they are entitled. For example, handicapped children in need of State services.

Juvenile delinquency has long been considered a problem for the States and not the Federal Government. It was not until 1961 that the Federal Government even addressed this issue when it passed the Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Offenses Control Act, which authorized $10 million for demonstration projects to reduce juvenile delinquency. This was the first major Federal legislation specifically addressing the problem. Over the next decade, Congress extended the program several times, and, in 1971, increased the funding level to $75 million.

In 1974, we created the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention and expanded the functions of this office to include identifying, treating, and rehabilitating juvenile delinquents. Still, for the most part, its efforts are concentrated on dealing with those juveniles already in our court system. Relatively few resources are devoted to prevention or rehabilitation. And we fund little if any research in prevention and rehabilitation of juveniles.

We have made scant progress in the treatment and prevention of juvenile delinquency. And no wonder. In 1972 the Federal Government spent $75 million to fund its juvenile delinquency program. Today, in fiscal year 1989, the Federal Government spends less than $65 million. With funding as low as this, major advances in the treatment and prevention of juvenile delinquency have been virtually impossible to achieve.

Since the inception of this office and programs directed at juvenile delinquency, the very nature of the problem has drastically changed. We have seen the average crime committed by most juveniles shift from arson, burglary, and larceny to armed assault and outright murder. All too many juveniles are now involved in violent crime—often gang-related activities associated with the drug trade.

For example, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Agency, John Lawn, reports that one-half of all juveniles in detention in the country are there as a result of drug-related crimes. Furthermore, 39 percent of juveniles in detention are there as a result of violent crime.

We are making some effort in Congress to address this problem as evidenced in the just passed Omnibus Anti-Substance Abuse Act of 1988. In this bill, we provide $15 million to target what we commonly refer to as high-risk youth. These are the very same young people about whom the statistics tell such a sorry tale. The money provided in this bill will enable school officials, law enforcement personnel, and community organizations to provide alternatives to those tempted—or worse—forced to join gangs. However, this legislation only seeks to dissuade, to prevent them from joining gangs. Learning what puts these young people at risk will take much research and time.

This is not to say that we know nothing of what makes individuals get into trouble with their parents, school administrators, and law enforcement officials. There is more than passing evidence to suggest that learning disabilities cause many juveniles to get in trouble. Often they become frustrated with their inability to succeed in school and unfortunately all too often, there are not the trained personnel on hand to aid them.

The most recent comprehensive study on juvenile delinquency and learning disability was conducted in the late 1970's by the National Center for State Courts. It showed that 36 percent of incarcerated juveniles were found to have a learning disability. It has also been estimated that within a typical jail population, at least 40 percent of the inmates suffer from learning disabilities. Since only 15 percent of the overall U.S. population is considered to be learning disabled, it is apparent that a disproportionate number of learning disabled individuals commit delinquent acts.

While there seems to be a significant relationship between learning disabilities and criminal behavior, the criminal justice system fails to recognize this correlation or provide for the treatment of such individuals. This must change.

Dr. Norman Brier, associate clinical professor of pediatrics and psychiatry at Albert Einstein College of Medicine, has been a pioneer in researching this relationship. Dr. Brier has developed what is known as the differential treatment hypothesis. This theory sets forth the claims that the juvenile justice system treats learning disabled individuals more harshly than those without learning disabilities. This occurs primarily because those with learning disabilities show more tendencies toward antisocial, aggressive behavior and poor school records than those without.

If we are to effectively address this problem, we must educate law enforcement officials and the courts about how to deal with and recognize learning disability. The legislation which I am introducing today gets more directly at this specific problem. This bill, which has been endorsed by the New York State District Attorneys' Association and the National Learning Disabilities Association, is based on an existing program begun last year by the late Bronx district attorney, Mario Merola. That program has successfully treated over 100 learning disabled young people.

And let that not go unnoticed. It is no small task to take a young man from the South Bronx and keep him off the streets and out of trouble. Our problem lies in that there are literally thousands of young men just like him who are not granted this opportunity. This bill is designed to change that—simply to allow district attorneys around the country to emulate the same close coordination between district attorneys and local universities and/or treatment facilities which exist in the Bronx program.

The Bronx district attorney's program operates in conjunction with the Rose F. Kennedy Center of the Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York. The Bronx program enjoys widespread support from numerous associations, universities, businesses and public officials, ranging from the mayor of New York, the National Association for Children and Adults with Learning Disabilities, the New York State Commission of Corrections, the New York University College of Dentistry, Fred the Furrier, and BIC Pens, Inc.

Specifically, this legislation that I am introducing today establishes a remedial education treatment program as an alternative to imprisonment for juveniles who are recognized as learning disabled. The purpose of this program is to reduce recidivism rates among first-time offenders; $15 million would be provided to the Attorney General who, in turn, would distribute this funding to local district attorneys who submit acceptable applications.

My legislation would also provide much needed funds to hire additional personnel to identify, evaluate, and treat those learning disabled juveniles who are regarded as suitable candidates for the program. The district attorney would make the final determination as to whether an individual candidate would be accepted into the program.

Defendants who meet the following criteria would be eligible for the program: a first-time offender under the age of 21 who has committed a misdemeanor where there is no serious injury to the victim; one who has been diagnosed as having a learning disability which the district attorney, in consultation with those trained in this field, regards as treatable; and finally, the defendants' participation in the program is determined by the district attorney to be in the best interests of society.

In order to receive credit for the program the defendant must comply with a number of conditions as set forth in a contract prepared by the district attorney. Among these is the requirement that the defendant spend over 100 hours in educational and vocational training. In this way, the juvenile improves his chances for successful rehabilitation, treats his learning disability, and reduces the chances that he will again come before a juvenile court. If these conditions are not met, the defendant would have to appear before the court for traditional sentencing.

In summary, the purpose of this legislation is to provide the resources to a district attorney to identify and treat a juvenile with learning disabilities. The frustration that often accompanies a learning disability can show up in the form of delinquent behavior and may be avoided if the disability is recognized and treated. Though there is no definitive proof that this one approach will break the connections associated with learning disability, it is a productive start.

It would be a tragedy for our criminal justice system to continue to ignore the problems of these young people. This bill, based on a highly successful program in New York, will give them a second chance. With my bill, which has the endorsement of a number of individuals and organizations, including the New York District Attorneys Association and the National Learning Disabilities Association, these learning disabled individuals will be redirected away from a life of crime and toward a more productive role in our society. The Learning Disabled Youthful Offender Rehabilitation Act will also reduce the prison population, thereby alleviating the overcrowding which has reached crisis proportions in many areas of the country.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support this important proposal. I ask that articles about the Bronx program which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor and in the New York Times be printed at this point in the RECORD. I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Learning Disabled Youthful Offender Rehabilitation Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) A significant correlation exists between learning disabled individuals and incidences of criminal behavior. Although only 15 percent of the United States population is considered to be learning disabled, 36 percent of juvenile delinquency cases involve individuals with learning disabilities.

(2) It is estimated that within a typical jail population, at least 40 percent of the inmates suffer from learning disabilities.

(3) Learning disabled individuals are more prone to a life of delinquency than non-learning disabled individuals.

(4) While a learning disability is clearly a significant contributor to delinquent and criminal behavior, the criminal justice system fails to recognize or attempt to treat individuals with learning disabilities.

(5) As long as the learning disability of an individual remains unaddressed, the delinquent behavior of the individual will continue upon release from imprisonment as evidenced by the high rates of recidivism among such individuals.

(6) Research has found that the neurological deficiencies resulting in problems of self-image, self-control and interpersonal activities contribute to academic failure of learning disabled individuals and are key elements in related criminal tendencies.

(7) Studies have found that diagnostically-based treatment programs for learning-disabled individuals can reduce recidivism and delinquent behavior among juveniles.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to establish a comprehensive educational and psychosocial prevention and intervention program in order to reduce the rate of recidivism among learning disabled first-time defendants. To accomplish this goal, the specific learning disability which accounts for the criminal behavior involved will be treated.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this Act, the term "local district attorney" means the chief criminal attorney for a general purpose unit of local government.

SEC. 4. GRANTS TO THE LOCAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The Attorney General is authorized to award grants to local district attorneys to develop educational programs offering an alternative to learning disabled defendants meeting the eligibility criteria as described in section 5.

SEC. 5. APPLICATIONS TO RECEIVE GRANTS.

(a) APPLICATION.—To request a grant under section 4, a local district attorney shall submit an application at such time and in such form as the Attorney General may require.

(b) PROGRAM PROPOSAL AND ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA.—Each application submitted pursuant to this section shall include a program proposal. The program proposal shall include the following guidelines and eligibility criteria:

(1) In order to be accepted into the program the defendant must—

(A) be under the age of 21 who has committed a misdemeanor in which there was not serious injury to the victim;

(B) have been diagnosed as having a learning disability which the local district attorney regards as treatable; and

(C) be subject to a determination by the local district attorney that it is in the best interests of society to allow the defendant into the rehabilitation program rather than incarceration.

(2) The following procedure shall be utilized by the local district attorney in determining which defendants are suitable as candidates for the program:

(A) Each defendant shall be recommended to the local district attorney's evaluatory staff by the defendant's defense attorney.

(B) Upon referral, the defendant shall complete a questionnaire which shall then be reviewed by a select evaluation committee.

(C) The select evaluation committee, in conjunction with the local district attorney's staff, shall make the final determination as to whether the program will be offered to the defendant.

(D) If the defendant is approved and chooses to participate in the program, such defendant shall comply with the conditions provided in paragraph (3) in order to receive credit for the program and avoid imprisonment.

(3) In order to receive credit for participation in the program the defendant shall be subject to the following conditions:

(A) The defendant shall be granted a conditional deferred prosecution and plead guilty to a crime or violation. The local district attorney shall have discretion to recommend sentencing on a case-by-case basis.

(B) The sentence or condition shall be a minimum of 100 hours in the educational and vocational program tailored to the needs of the individual defendant. The defendant shall specifically agree to the requirements and procedures of this program.

(C) When a finding of default has been filed against a defendant, the case shall be restored to the court calendar for execution of sentence or further proceedings.

(D) If the defendant has absconded, a bench warrant shall be issued for the defendant.

(c) APPLICANT CERTIFICATION.—Each applicant for funds under this Act shall certify that the applicant's program meets all the requirements of this section, that all the information contained in the application is correct, and that the applicant will comply with all the provisions of this Act and all other applicable Federal laws. Such certification shall be made in a form acceptable to the Attorney General.

SEC. 6. USE OF FUNDS.

Funds authorized by this Act shall be used for devising a system for—

(1) identifying learning disabled individuals; and

(2) hiring evaluatory and remedial agents in order to identify and treat eligible learning disabled defendants.

SEC. 7. REPORT.

Each applicant receiving funds under this Act shall prepare and transmit to the Attorney General a report setting forth with respect to the program of the applicant during the preceding 12-month period—

(1) a complete accounting of the expenditure of funds;

(2) the number of learning disabled individuals eligible for the program and the number that completed the program;

(3) the estimated cost of treatment for each such learning disabled individual in the program;

(4) the estimated cost savings which resulted from carrying out the program in lieu of prosecuting and incarcerating each learning disabled individual in the program;

(5) an evaluation of the change in academic ability and employment success of each learning disabled individual resulting from participation in the program;

(6) the change in recidivism rates for learning disabled individuals in the program using such individuals as a standard against which the national average shall be measured in order to test the effectiveness of the program; and

(7) recommendations regarding whether the program should be instituted on a wider basis.

The information required by clause (5) shall be supplemented by a second report, to be issued 12 months later, again evaluating each individual's academic and employment status in order to gauge the longer-term effectiveness of the program.

SEC 8. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated $15,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992 to carry out this Act.

THROWING THE BOOKS AT YOUNG OFFENDERS

(By Victoria Irwin)

Tito Merced listens quietly while the Bronx assistant district attorney discusses his future. "You're young and you have your whole life ahead of you," says Thomas Olin. "We don't want you to have a record. If you shape up, we'll give you a clean slate. The rest is up to you."

A 17-year-old high school dropout, Tito was arrested on assault charges stemming from a fight with some other youths. But instead of being cycled into a justice system that sometimes seems to offer only a "diploma in crime," Tito has been given a chance to finish high school through General Educational Development (GED).

The education outreach program that Mr. Olin directs for the Bronx County District Attorney's Office targets first-time offenders who are learning disabled, illiterate, or high school dropouts.

Pointing out that there is a link between learning disabilities and criminal behavior, Bronx District Attorney Mario Merola says he hopes the program can help defendants get back on the right road. Criminal-justice experts say the program is innovative and on target.

"What we're trying to do is put total emphasis on education," says Olin. "And we use the long arm of the law to do this."

"I want my GED," Tito tells Olin. With that a deal is sealed; Tito is given an ACD—adjournment and contemplation of dismissal. In return, the slight, handsome teenager pledges to attend evening GED courses twice a week for six months. He will also report to the Bronx criminal courthouse once a week. And if he fails to live up to the terms of the bargain, his case will become active again.

More than simply an alternative sentencing program that frees needed jail space through work programs, the Bronx effort is community based, and does intensive screening, careful matching of defendants with educational programs, counseling, and regular contact. Followup and job placement efforts are being considered.

The need has always been there, says Mr. Merola.

The defendants are often unemployed, and have few marketable skills. Reading level is often very low—around third- or fourth-grade level. And not a small number have learning disabilities that have gone unattended for years. Some studies estimate that as many as 40 percent of the criminal population have learning disabilities.

While Merola admits he likes the program because it helps relieve the need for jail space, he also says these kinds of defendants are often entitled to a better deal than jail.

"[Olin] says we should be guilty for not providing them with services, and there is a certain truth to that," says Merola. The outreach program helps divert defendants from the system, which he says is a revolving door.

Why should a district attorney's office be offering this program?

"The education system is not doing its job," says Merola. "We take it for granted, but they can't read or write. Don't we owe them at least this much?"

Offenders have been charged with car theft, drug selling, possession of crack. But Denise O'Daly, a junior high school teacher by day who teaches a GED course at night, says she very much enjoys teaching the program members.

"[The defendants] are just like the other students," Ms. O'Daly says. "They are extremely motivated."

Olin points out that the district attorney's first duty is to the community—to improve the quality of life and keep a lid on crime.

He sees this program as working in tandem with that goal.

"He's off the street, rubbing shoulders with people who are learning," says Merola. "You can't minimize that. We try to make them part of the mainstream, and not something to be discarded."

He tells what often happens to kids like Tito Merced—they come before a judge who looks at the case, tells them to be good or they'll go to jail next time, and then sends them out on the street.

"That's discarding him," says Merola. "We're not going to solve it all. We're not running a Hollywood gimmick. . . . Life is a game of inches.

HELP OF COURTS SOUGHT FOR LEARNING DISABLED

(By Kirk Johnson]

The world of the learning-disabled child—clouded by frustration and failure in school—often descends into an orbit of crime, courtrooms and prison, according to law-enforcement studies. Society's efforts to help usually stop at the schoolyard gate.

In New York, a group of officials in education and criminal justice—including a judge and prosecutor who themselves have learning disabilities—are taking the first steps toward changing that pattern, by changing the attitude of the courts.

Their message is that learning-disabled children can be helped by the court system through education and training when they first get into trouble.

"What I'm obsessed with is how much more we could be doing," said Thomas Olin, an assistant district attorney in the Bronx. Mr. Olin, a 28-year-old native of Rockland County, has dyslexia—a disorder that makes printed letters and words appear in reverse or jumbled. He joined the prosecutor's office last year after graduating from Fordham University Law School entirely by oral examination.

Learning disabilities—which affect the mind's ability to gain, retain or express certain information but do not affect intelligence—were first recognized around the turn of the century. But the link to crime is a recent one: law-enforcement experts say the idea began to gain acceptance in 1983, when the American Bar Association passed a resolution recognizing it.

The connection is borne out by statistics: though 15 percent of the population have learning disabilities, more than 36 percent of juvenile-delinquency cases involved such people, according to Federal and private studies. But, the experts say, the reasons remain unclear.

Last month, at Mr. Olin's suggestion, the prosecutor's office established what it calls the Education Outreach Program, with the goal of identifying learning-disabled defendants, and in certain instances, putting them into training or educational programs instead of jail. So far, three such defendants have been admitted to the program, of which Mr. Olin is the director. Seven others, who are not considered learning-disabled but have severe problems in school, have been enrolled in other types of training.

Law enforcement officials say there have been several other recent developments in New York. But progress, they say, remains tentative. Money for large programs has not yet been found.

ESTIMATES ON INMATES

At the state Commission of Correction, for example, several programs have been started this year to determine how disabled persons become enmeshed in the justice system. Preliminary estimates from the studies show that from 10 percent to 40 percent of the inmates in the state's county-jail system may have some learning or other developmental disability. About 60 percent do not have high-school diplomas.

In the city's Family Court system, a manual for judges—the first of its kind, according to law-enforcement experts—has been distributed on how to deal with and recognize learning-disabled defendants. A similar manual for attorneys representing learning-disabled defendants, prepared by the American Bar Association, was distributed nationally last year, and recently updated.

The manuals were financed by the New York-based Foundation for Children with Learning Disabilities, a 10-year-old organization that began financing research into the disability-crime link two years ago and has worked with Mr. Olin.

Judge Jeffry H. Gallet, a 43-year-old Queens native, overcame several learning disabilities, including dyslexia, dyscalculia (difficulty in making mathematical calculations) and dysgraphia (difficulty in writing) sufficiently enough to graduate from law school and write five books on civil-law procedure. But he said he still had to look at his watch to tell his right hand from his left.

"I'd love to say there's an up side, a good program," the Judge said. "But I can't. It's just all too slow."

"It's mostly been just a change of awareness," said Dr. Julie Gilligan, a spokesman for the foundation.

But judges and correction officials said that though the efforts of people such as Mr. Olin, Judge Gallet and the foundation's officials have increased recognition of the problems of learning-disabled people in the courts, the lack of money for large-scale testing or education programs means that, in effect, little has changed.

Education researchers said that 20 different types of learning disabilities have been identified, from dyslexia—the most well-known—to dysacusis (a hearing impairment that causes a distortion of pitch) to dysnomia (the inability to recall certain words).

The reasons for the connection between these disabilities and crime, however, are much less clear, they said. According to Judge Thomas McGee, a juvenile court judge in Louisiana—and one of the pioneers in treating the learning disabled on the court level—there are several current theories. The first is that frustration in school and at home leads to crime. The second is the learning-disabled people get convicted more in the courts, often because they don't understand their legal rights, and are less able to "talk their way out of situations" or explain their behavior to the police and judges.

For the moment, Judge Gallet said he is relying on the personal touch. When he thinks a defendant might be learning-disabled, the judge calls him or her into chambers and talks about himself and his disabilities, and how he "beat it."

"Sometimes you can teach a kid that way," he said.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 231. A bill to amend part A of title IV of the Social Security Act to improve quality control standards and procedures under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children Program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

AFDC QUALITY CONTROL IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today at the outset of the 101st Congress to introduce the AFDC Quality Control Improvement Act of 1989.

As I do so, I should like to pay tribute to a friend and colleague, the distinguished former senior Senator and Governor of the State of Washington, Daniel J. Evans. This legislation is a product of his diligent efforts to improve the administration of our Nation's welfare system. On June 16, 1988, when Senator Evans first introduced this legislation, I pledged that I would do my utmost as chairman of the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Social Security and Family Policy to carry forward his excellent work on the AFDC quality control system. Early in the 101st Congress I mean to make good on that promise.

THE TIME FOR AFDC QUALITY CONTROL REFORM IS HERE

There is little disagreement that the AFDC quality control program needs remodeling. Indeed, Congress has recognized this on several occasions by imposing moratoria on the collection of fiscal sanctions for quality control errors. First, in the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-272), Congress imposed a 24-month moratorium on the collection of quality control sanctions and directed the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to contract with the National Academy of Sciences [NAS] to conduct an independent study of the AFDC quality control system. While waiting for that NAS study to be completed, Congress twice extended the moratorium: once in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987 (Public Law 100-203) and again in the Family Support Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-485). The moratorium currently in place will expire on July 1, 1989.

If we act quickly, however, we may not need another stopgap moratorium. We now have the NAS study and recommendations. The bill Senator Evans introduced in the 100th Congress, and that I reintroduce today, follows the academy's lead.

So you see, Mr. President, there is already congressional agreement that the current AFDC quality control system needs to be overhauled. And thanks to the NAS, we have a good idea of what ought to be done. Before explaining the key provisions of the bill, it might be helpful to review how we came to be in this fix.

EVOLUTION OF AFDC QUALITY CONTROL

Since its inception half a century ago, AFDC has been a State-administered, federally subsidized program. When errors are made—both State and Federal dollars are involved. There are numerous sources of error, but they can be generally categorized as follows: "Overpayments" include, first, payments to households that later prove to be ineligible for benefits and, second, benefit payments that exceed what should have been paid. "Underpayments" include, first, payments that provide eligible families with less than what the law requires and, second, erroneous terminations and denials—administrative actions that result in failure to pay benefits to eligible families. Finally, there are technical errors—procedural errors that do not actually result in misexpenditures of any kind.

When States make errors—whether some sort of overpayment or underpayment—there are fiscal and human consequences. Overpayments waste both State and Federal money. It is worth noting that State officials are no less keen than we are when it comes to guarding against wasteful spending. Wrongly denying benefits to eligible families hurts poor children. Clearly, it is the intent of Congress that families eligible for AFDC receive the benefits to which the law entitles them—neither more nor less.

Yet, congressional oversight of AFDC administration did not begin in earnest until the early 1960's. In 1962, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, Senator BYRD, then chairman of the Senate Subcommittee for the District of Columbia, commissioned a study of the District's AFDC eligibility determination process. The study's results were shocking—it was found that over half of all AFDC recipients in the District of Columbia were in fact not eligible for benefits.

As a result, the General Accounting Office and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare [HEW] conducted a nationwide eligibility review the following year. This study found a much lower error rate, of between 2 and 15 percent. Better, certainly than 50 percent, but the results clearly indicated a need for improved management.

In 1964, HEW issued nationwide "quality control" regulations to address the ineligibility problem. Follow-up research showed that these initial regulations were largely ineffective. HEW revised the regulations in 1970 and again in 1973. It was in 1973 that the Department proposed fiscal penalties for States whose error rates for overpayments exceeded federally established "tolerance levels." The final regulations, published in 1975, imposed fiscal penalties or disallowances for the Federal share of overpayments in excess of error rate tolerance levels of 3 percent for payments to ineligible households and 5 percent for other overpayments.

It is important to note that these so-called tolerance levels were not based on a single shred of empirical evidence. Simply put, there were numbers that were made up. Worse, HEW did not seem much interested in helping States to cope with the administrative complexities of the AFDC Program. Indeed, from the States' lookout, the Federal Government seemed fixated on only one thing: penalizing States for overpayments—but no underpayments—in a most arbitrary way. Without regard to their unique situations, States were told to meet a federally dictated tolerance level—plucked from thin air—"or else * * *."

Thirteen States immediately filed suit against HEW, challenging the validity of the error-rate tolerance levels. On May 14, 1976, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled in Maryland versus Mathews that the tolerance levels were "arbitrary and capricious" and "inconsistent with the purpose of the [Social Security] Act." Specifically, Judge June L. Green stated:

> The tolerance level set must be reasonable and supported by a factual basis and not established in an arbitrary or capricious manner. To establish a level under any lesser standard would be to fashion a tool which is inconsistent with the Act in that it does not promote any further efficiency and it prevents the state from furnishing assistance as far as practicable given the conditions in the state * * *. Consequently, in view of the fact that the tolerance levels were arbitrarily established at 3 percent and 5 percent without the benefit of an empirical study, the Court holds that the regulation as it concerns the 3 percent and 5 percent levels was framed in an arbitrary and capricious manner and as an abuse of discretion. It is thereby inconsistent with the purpose of the Act by preventing the states from furnishing assistance as far as practicable given the conditions of the state, and is therefore invalid.

In the wake of the Federal court's ruling, HEW went back to the drawing board. In the late 1970's, just as the Department was putting new regulations together, Congress stepped in. I fear, Mr. President, that Congress rushed in where angels fear to tread. On June 8, 1978, the 95th Congress adopted the Michel amendment—as part of the Labor and HEW appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979, Public Law 95-480—establishing statutory overpayment performance standards of 4 percent for Medicaid and AFDC.

Unfortunately, like the earlier regulations declared invalid by the court, the Michel amendment did not base its performance standards on empirical evidence. Rather, the Michel amendment merely reconciled the Social Security Act and HEW's "capricious" regulations by writing equally arbitrary performance standards into the act itself.

Not content with our original—albeit well-intentioned—mistake, Congress came back, in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-248), and lowered the error-rate tolerance level for AFDC to 3 percent, beginning in fiscal year 1984. This tolerance level is still in the statute.

Have the States met this exacting standard? No. Has the Federal Government collected fiscal sanctions? No. Why not? Because we bought ourselves a pig in a poke: State-initiated litigation and congressionally imposed moratoria on collecting sanctions prohibit HHS from enforcing the statutory monster we created.

Enough. Let us try to put this mess to rights.

CURRENT LAW IS STILL "ARBITRARY AND CAPRICIOUS"

Mr. President, I have no brief with the Federal Government's desire to improve administrative accuracy and to root out waste in the AFDC Program. As a matter of fact, I applaud the impulse. Whether or not to have quality control is not at issue. Who among us does not want the AFDC Program to operate fairly and efficiently? The question, rather, is how best to structure an AFDC quality control system.

I don't think anyone will disagree with me when I say our current system of quality control is deeply flawed. How else can one explain the fact that 49 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico are subject to AFDC fiscal sanctions totalling $1.2 billion for fiscal years 1981-86? If only one State—the great State of Nevada—with 0.2 percent of the Nation's AFDC caseload—can meet the current-law overpayment tolerance level for AFDC, something is very wrong.

On October 14, 1987, in testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance, Senator Evans put it this way:

> Anytime you have a program where 49 out of the 50 States are under sanction * * * because of excessive error rates, that indicates clearly to me not that 49 out of 50 States are incompetent in their administration but that the system itself is giving us the wrong answers.

In short, Mr. President, the current-law error rate tolerance levels and fiscal sanctions are still, in the words of Judge Green, "arbitrary and capricious." The States have long recognized this sad fact. They have gone to court before and stand ready to litigate again. Congress also knows there is a big problem: We've imposed moratoria on sanctions collections while awaiting the National Academy of Sciences study. The exhaustive Academy study and recommendations were published in March 1988. Now, then, is the time to act.

RESTRUCTURING AFDC QUALITY CONTROL

The legislation I introduce today would fundamentally restructure the AFDC quality control system and correct a number of its present problems.

First, we would base error rate tolerance levels on experience rather than caprice. For instance, rather than requiring that all States meet an arbitrary 3 percent error rate tolerance level, this legislation would set the tolerance level at the national average error rate for AFDC overpayments for the preceding fiscal year, minus 1 percentage point—but not less than 3 percent or more than 7.15 percent. In this way, the tolerance level is derived from actual error rates, yet still requires incremental improvement over the national average error rate for the previous year.

Second, the error rate tolerance level would be adjusted to account for varying State conditions which hamper administration of the AFDC Program. For example, a State's tolerance level would be increased by, (a) 0.5 percentage points if it is currently operating the AFDC-UP Program; (b) 0.1 percentage points if its AFDC caseload includes an unusually high proportion of families with earned income; (c) 0.1 percentage points for each metropolitan area in the State classified as 1 of the 30 most populous metropolitan areas in the country; (d) 0.1 percentage points if the rate of increase in its AFDC caseload in a given year is unusually high; and (e) 0.1 percentage points if its AFDC caseload includes an unusually high proportion of families with greater than five members receiving AFDC.

Third, purely technical errors and errors due to recent Federal legislative changes in eligibility criteria or methods of administration would be disregarded for the purpose of determining overpayment error rates.

Fourth, each State would be required to submit and—upon approval by the Secretary—implement a quality control improvement plan, outlining the ways in which the State intends to decrease its error rate. If a State's plan increases spending to improve AFDC administration by a sum equal to or exceeding one-half of the fiscal sanction it owes for a given fiscal year, the Secretary would be required to waive that fiscal sanction.

Fifth, this legislation would provide incentive payments to States whose error rates fall below 3 percent in a given fiscal year.

I believe that these provisions, along with others which closely follow the recommendations of the National Academy of Sciences report, will greatly improve the AFDC quality control system in the future.

ADDRESSING THE SANCTION BACKLOG

But what of the $1.2 billion in accumulated fiscal sanctions owed by all States but one under the current system?

This legislation would require the Secretary of Health and Human Services to combine, for each fiscal year—fiscal years 1981–86—the error rates for all States liable for sanctions into a single error-rate distribution. Sanctions would only be imposed on those States with very bad error rates in any given year. In statistical parlance, only the outliers, or States whose error rates are abnormally high, would be subject to sanctions for past years. In this way, States with egregiously high error rates—relative to other States' error rates, not a capricious standard—will be held accountable for past errors.

TIME TO ACT

Last year, Congress took steps to improve the Food Stamp quality control system by passing the Emergency Hunger Relief Act of 1988 (Public Law 100–435). It is now time to act on AFDC quality control.

In the 100th Congress we radically redefined our Nation's welfare system with enactment into law of the Family Support Act. Yet the future success of that act depends, in large part, on our ability to correct the flaws of the AFDC quality control system. Once again, our former colleague, Dan Evans, hit the nail on the head:

We are now in a position to initiate substantive reform. * * * If we wait, the amount anticipated in collection begins to climb again. Thus, the longer we delay, the more difficult the task becomes. The number of States subject to fiscal penalties inevitably will reach 50, the amount of money pending in penalties will climb, States will not be able to improve their management efficiency with a continued drain on their dwindling resources. If they are forced to pay sanctions by our inability to act, they will be paid out of state program budgets. And in the end, we will end up hurting the program beneficiaries—the very people we are trying to help.

What Senator Evans understood so well, is that this flawed AFDC quality control system threatens the Governors' ability to improve AFDC Program administration. If the Federal Government sanctions the States and the States can't make up the loss of these Federal AFDC dollars, there will be budget cuts. Who will suffer? Very likely the harm will come to those who are most vulnerable—poor children.

The potential harm does not end there. The flawed AFDC quality control system also jeopardizes the successful implementation of the Family Support Act, including the centerpiece of that act, the new JOBS Program. Why? Because the money States will forfeit in fiscal sanctions will not be invested in expanded education, training, and work programs for poor parents.

The figures bear repeating, Mr. President: Together, 49 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico owe $1.2 billion in AFDC sanctions for fiscal years 1981–86. My own State of New York owes $227 million—nearly a quarter of a billion dollars. Would not this money be better spent on trying to break the cycle of dependency?

I urge my colleagues to join with me in support of this important effort to overhaul the AFDC quality control system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that illustrative tables and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 231

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "AFDC Quality Control Improvement Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. IMPROVEMENTS IN AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN QUALITY CONTROL STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 403(i) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(i)(1)(A) In order to establish and maintain improved quality control standards and procedures in the operation and administration of State plans approved under this part—

"(i) each State shall collect and submit to the Secretary, in accordance with a timetable which shall be established by the Secretary in regulations, statistically reliable samples of the cases under its plan approved under this part during each fiscal year;

"(ii) the Secretary shall review and analyze the samples so submitted and shall notify the State of its error rates for the period involved, for overpayments and underpayments, within 6 months after the close of the fiscal year or within 6 months after the date on which the samples are submitted, whichever is later; and

"(iii) the State shall develop and submit to the Secretary (except as provided by subparagraph (C)) a quality improvement plan for eliminating or reducing errors identified as a result of the Secretary's review and analysis under clause (ii) (whether or not such errors are subject to inclusion for purposes of sanctions under this subsection), including a timetable for implementation; and, after such plan has been reviewed and approved by the Secretary in accordance with subparagraph (D), the Secretary shall continuously monitor the State's quality improvement process under such plan.

"(B) The Secretary shall establish procedures for quality control review of cases receiving payments under approved State plans which shall be adequate to assure that State error rates are validly determined. Such procedures shall include a field investigation of each case selected for quality control review.

"(C) The requirement (in subparagraph (A)(iii)) that States submit quality improvement plans for eliminating or reducing errors may be waived by the Secretary in the case of any State which consistently has had error rates below the applicable error rate tolerance level (as determined by the Secretary, upon the request of the State, in the manner provided in subparagraphs (B) and (C) of paragraph (2)).

"(D) The Secretary shall establish criteria for quality improvement plans submitted by States under subparagraph (A)(iii), and shall approve any plan so submitted upon determining that it meets such criteria. If a plan so submitted is disapproved, the Secretary shall specify (in notifying the State of such disapproval) the respect or respects in which the plan fails to meet the criteria so established, and shall provide appropriate advice and assistance to the State in eliminating such failure with the objective of facilitating the resubmission and approval of the plan at the earliest possible time.

"(2)(A)(i) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1) (but subject to subparagraph (C) and paragraph (3)), if a State's error rate for overpayments for any fiscal year (as defined in paragraph (5)(A)(i)) exceeds the error rate tolerance level for overpayments determined for the State (for that year) under subparagraph (B), then the Secretary shall make no payment for such fiscal year with respect to the State's overpayments (as so defined) to the extent that the inclusion of such overpayments in determining the State's error rate caused such rate to exceed the tolerance level so determined.

"(ii) The Secretary shall promptly notify the State of any decision to withhold payments (with respect to the State's overpayments) under clause (i). If the State files a timely appeal of such decision the Secretary shall not withhold any payments under clause (i), and no interest on the amounts proposed to be withheld shall accrue for any period, until (I) the appeal has been finally determined (and then only in accordance with such final determination), or (II) the appeal is no longer being actively pursued.

"(B) A State's error rate tolerance level for overpayments for any fiscal year shall be equal to the national average error rate for overpayments for the preceding fiscal year minus 1 percentage point, but not less than 3 percent or more than 7.15 percent, increased by—

"(i) 0.5 percentage points if the plan of such State approved under this part provides (throughout such fiscal year) for the payment of aid with respect to dependent children of unemployed parents as provided in section 407;

"(ii) 0.1 percentage points for each full 20-percent increment (up to a maximum of 5 such increments) by which (I) the ratio of the number of families with earned income who are receiving aid under such State's approved plan to the total number of families receiving such aid exceeds (II) the average ratio, per State, of the number of families with earned income who are receiving aid under all of the State plans approved under this part to the total number of families receiving such aid;

"(iii) 0.1 percentage points for each Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area in the State which is one of the 30 most populous Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas in all of the States having plans approved under this part;

"(iv) 0.1 percentage points for each full 20-percent increment (up to a maximum of 5 such increments) by which (I) the rate of increase in the caseload under such State's plan approved under this part exceeds (II) the national average rate of increase in the caseload under all of the State plans approved under this part; and

"(v) 0.1 percentage points for each full 20-percent increment (up to a maximum of 5 such increments) by which (I) the ratio of the number of families with 5 or more persons who are receiving aid under such State's approved plan to the total number of families receiving aid under such plans exceeds (II) the average ratio, per State, of the number of families with 5 or more persons who are receiving aid under all of the plans approved under this part to the total number of families who are receiving aid under such plans.

"(C) In determining the error rate for overpayments in any State for purposes of this paragraph—

"(i) an error rate determination plan, representing an agreement between the Secretary and the State and providing for the measurement of errors against State practice as outlined in State regulations and policy clarifications, shall be negotiated with the Secretary to establish the criteria by which the State will be held accountable for errors;

"(ii) each such rate shall be fixed at the lower bound of the standard 95-percent interval for errors within which the State's applicable true error rate falls (as determined without regard to this clause on the basis of the samples collected and submitted by the State under paragraph (1));

"(iii) errors which are technical in nature or have no fiscal impact, including but not limited to omissions (from the State's files) of social security account numbers, applications for social security account numbers, assignments of support rights, declarations of cooperation in obtaining support, monthly reporting errors, and WIN or other work program registrations, shall be disregarded;

"(iv) errors resulting from major Federal legislative changes in eligibility criteria or methods of administration, occurring within the 1-year period beginning on the effective date of such changes, shall be disregarded; and

"(v) errors resulting from changes in Federal administrative policy or practice affecting error rates for overpayments, occurring within the 90-day period beginning on the effective date of such changes, shall be disregarded.

"(D) The total amount of the sanctions that would otherwise be imposed upon a State under subparagraph (A) on account of an error rate for overpayments in excess of the applicable error rate tolerance level for any fiscal year shall be reduced by the Federal share of any overpayments collected by such State during that fiscal year.

"(E) The total amount of the sanctions that would otherwise be imposed upon a State under subparagraph (A) on account of an error rate tolerance level for any fiscal year shall be reduced by the amounts collected as support by such State under section 651 et seq. of the Social Security Act during that fiscal year.

"(3)(A) The Secretary, in accordance with this paragraph, may waive all or any part of any sanction that would otherwise be imposed upon a State under paragraph (2)(A) if such State is unable to reach the applicable error rate tolerance level for the fiscal year involved despite a good-faith effort by such State.

"(B) Any State may request a waiver of all or part of any sanction that would otherwise be imposed for any fiscal year under paragraph (2)(A), basing such request upon a showing—

"(i) that the State made (and is continuing to make) a good faith effort to reduce or eliminate the overpayments involved but was unable to reach the applicable error rate tolerance level for such fiscal year despite that effort; or

"(ii) that (I) the Secretary's determination of the State's error rate for overpayments for such fiscal year was made incorrectly or in a manner inconsistent with the provisions of this subsection, and (II) such error rate, if determined correctly and in a proper manner, would be lower than the rate so determined by the Secretary.

The Secretary shall consider and review such request, and either approve it or disapprove it in whole or in part, in accordance with a timetable which shall be specified in regulations. If the Secretary disapproves the request, the State may appeal the Secretary's decision to the Great Appeals Board in the Department of Health and Human Services for such further action as may be provided for by law or regulations (including judicial review of the Secretary's decision or the Board's determination).

"(C) In considering and reviewing any request for a waiver submitted by a State under this paragraph, the Secretary shall take into account—

"(i) factors beyond the State's control (including disasters, strikes by State or other staff personnel engaged in determining eligibility or processing cases, and State actions resulting from incorrect policy interpretations by Federal officials);

"(ii) factors relating to agency commitment, including demonstrated commitment by upper level State officials to the error reduction program under this subsection, the sufficiency and quality of programs designed to reduce errors, and effective management of the quality improvement process;

"(iii) the State's past performance with respect to overpayments, including past error rate levels and past error rate reduction efforts;

"(iv) the cost effectiveness of error rate reduction, both in general and in the particular circumstances existing within the State; and

"(v) such other factors as the Secretary may determine to be appropriate, as specified in regulations or as detailed by the State in its waiver request.

The Secretary's regulations shall specify the factors to be considered and the criteria to be used in assessing waiver requests under this paragraph, and shall indicate the relative weight or importance of each of such factors and criteria in order to assist States in determining the appropriateness of proposed requests.

"(D) Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this paragraph, the Secretary shall in any case grant a waiver requested by a State under subparagraph (B) for any fiscal year if the State's quality improvement plan submitted under paragraph (1)(C), or a separate plan for the reduction of errors submitted by the State along with its waiver request, provides in detail for the expenditure of additional State and local funds for the reduction of errors in such fiscal year and in a total amount (over and above the amount of State and local funds that would otherwise be expended in such fiscal year for the administration of the State plan approved under this part) equal to or exceeding one-half of the net amount of the sanctions that would otherwise be imposed upon the State under paragraph (2)(A) for such fiscal year. Expenditures of additional State and local funds for the reduction of errors as provided for in the corrective action plan or separate plan described in the preceding sentence shall be considered (for purposes of subsection (a)) to be expenditures for the proper and efficient administration of the State plan approved under this part.

"(4)(A) Each State agency administering a plan approved under this part shall, at such times and in such form as the Secretary may specify, provide additional information on overpayments made in connection with its administration of such plan, together with any other data which the Secretary may request that are reasonably necessary for the Secretary to carry out the provisions of this subsection.

"(B) If a State fails to cooperate with the Secretary in providing information necessary to carry out this subsection, the Secretary directly or through such contractual or other arrangements as the Secretary may find appropriate, shall establish the error rate or rates involved for that State on the basis of the best data reasonably available and in accordance with such techniques for sampling and estimating as the Secretary may find appropriate.

"(5) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) the term 'error rate' for any State for any fiscal year means—

"(i) with respect to such State's overpayments for such year (as defined in subparagraph (B)), the ratio of such overpayments to its total payments under the State plan for such year (in this section referred to as the 'error rate for overpayments'), and

"(ii) with respect to such State's underpayments for such year (as defined in subparagraph (C)), the ratio of such underpayments to its total payments under the State plan for such year (in this section referred to as the 'error rate for underpayments'), determined (in each case) subject to the adjustments provided for in paragraph (2)(C);

"(B) the term 'overpayments' means (i) overpayments to eligible families receiving assistance, and (ii) payments to ineligible families receiving assistance; and

"(C) the term 'underpayments' means underpayments to eligible families receiving assistance.

"(6) This subsection shall not apply with respect to Puerto Rico, Guam or the Virgin Islands.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE; TREATMENT OF QUALITY CONTROL SANCTIONS BACKLOG FROM

PRIOR LAW.—(1) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall be effective only with respect to the fiscal year 1987 and subsequent fiscal years.

(2)(A) In order to eliminate as quickly as possible the backlog of sanctions remaining to be applied, with respect to the fiscal years 1981 through 1986, under section 403(i) of the Social Security Act as in effect prior to the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall combine the error rate for each State liable for sanctions under section 403(i) for each such fiscal year into a single distribution of error rates for that year, and identify for sanctions under section 403(i) as so in effect only those States whose error rates for the year involved are extremely large in relation to, or significantly outside the range of, that distribution.

(B) Before taking the action described in subparagraph (A), the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, in consultation with the Secretary of Health and Human Services, shall establish the threshold to be used in identifying the States whose error rates for any of the fiscal years involved are to be considered extremely large, or significantly outside the range of, the distribution of rates required by that subparagraph.

(C)(i) Sanctions under section 403(i) of the Social Security Act as in effect prior to the enactment of this Act shall be imposed only on States identified for such sanctions under subparagraph (A); and for purposes of such sanctions (subject to clause (ii) of this subparagraph) section 403(i) of such Act as so in effect shall continue in effect notwithstanding the amendment made by subsection (a) of this section.

(ii) Paragraphs (2)(A)(ii), (2)(C)(ii), (2)(C)(iii), and (3) of section 403(i) of the Social Security Act (as amended by subsection (a) of this section) shall apply for purposes of this paragraph with respect to any State which has been identified for sanctions under subparagraph (a), as though they were included in section 403(i) of such Act as in effect prior to the enactment of this Act.

(c) REVIEW OF ERROR RATE TOLERANCE LEVELS.—Upon the expiration of 3 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall review in detail the actual performance of the various States under section 403(i) of the Social Security Act as amended by subsection (a) of this section, with particular reference to the appropriateness of the error rate tolerance levels established by paragraph (2)(B) of such section 403(i) as so amended and the effectiveness of such levels in achieving the quality control objectives of that section. The Secretary shall submit to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, for further legislative action, a full and complete statement of the results of such review together with any recommendations which may appear appropriate for modifications in the error rate tolerance levels so established.

SEC. 3. EXTENSION OF QUALITY CONTROL PROGRAM TO INCLUDE CASES INVOLVING UNDERPAYMENTS.

(a) SANCTIONS.—Section 403(i)(2)(A) of the Social Security Act (as amended by section 1(a) of this Act) is further amended to read as follows:

"(A) Notwithstanding subsection (a)(1) (but subject to subparagraph (C) and paragraph (3))—

"(i) if a State's error rate for overpayments for any fiscal year (as defined in paragraph (5)(A)(i)) exceeds the error rate tolerance level for overpayments determined for the State (for that year) under subparagraph (B), then the Secretary shall make no payment for such fiscal year with respect to the State's overpayments (as defined in paragraph (5)(B)) to the extent that the inclusion of such payments in determining such error rate cause such rate to exceed the tolerance level so determined; and

"(ii) if a State's error rate for underpayments for any fiscal year (as defined in paragraph (5)(A)(ii)) exceeds the error rate tolerance level for underpayments determined for the State (for that year) under subparagraph (B), then the State shall be required in accordance with regulations of the Secretary to set aside an amount equal to the total amount by which the State's underpayments for that year (as defined in paragraph (5)(C)) exceeded the State's error rate tolerance level for underpayments (for that year), and to use the amount so set aside for the exclusive purpose of increasing the payment level under its approved State plan or of improving the administration of such plan, or both.".

(b) ERROR RATE TOLERANCE LEVELS.—Section 403(i)(2)(B) of such Act (as so amended) is further amended by adding at the end (after and below clause (v)) the following new sentence: "A State's error rate tolerance level for underpayments for any fiscal year shall be the level that would be determined with respect to such underpayments (if there were overpayments) under the preceding provisions of this paragraph, except that for this purpose the figure "0.5" in clause (i) and the figure "0.1" in each of the succeeding clauses shall be deemed to be "0.05" and "0.01", respectively.".

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 403(i) of such Act (as so amended) is further amended—

(1) by striking "error rate for overpayments" in the matter preceding clause (i) in paragraph (2)(C) and inserting "error rates";

(2) by striking "overpayments" in paragraph (2)(C)(v) and inserting "overpayments or underpayments";

(3) by inserting "or underpayments" after "overpayments" in paragraph (3)(B)(i);

(4) by inserting "or underpayments" after "overpayments" in paragraph (3)(B)(ii);

(5) by inserting "and underpayments" after "overpayments" in subparagraph (C)(iii);

(6) by striking "overpayments made" in paragraph (4)(A) and inserting in lieu thereof "overpayments and underpayments made"; and

(7) by striking "error rate" in paragraph (4)(C) in inserting "error rate or rates".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall be effective only with respect to quarters in the fiscal year 1991 and in subsequent fiscal years.

SEC. 4. INCENTIVE PAYMENTS TO STATES.

Section 403(i) of the Social Security Act (as amended by the preceding provisions of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(7)(A) If a State's ratio of erroneous excess payments to its total payments (as determined under paragraph (1)) is less than 0.03 for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall pay to such State as an incentive payment an amount equal to 50 percent of the net amount by which Federal payments to such State for such fiscal year are reduced by reason of such ratio being less than 0.03.".

SEC. 5. INAPPROPRIATE DENIALS AND TERMINATIONS.

(a) INCLUSION OF INAPPROPRIATE DENIALS AND TERMINATIONS FOR PURPOSES OF DATA COLLECTION AND REVIEW.—Effective as provided in section 1(b)(1), section 403(i) of the Social Security Act (as amended by the preceding provisions of this Act) is further amended as follows:

(1) paragraph (1)(A)(i) is amended by inserting "and negative case actions" after "cases";

(2) paragraph (1)(A)(ii) is amended by striking "and underpayments" and inserting, "underpayments, and erroneous negative case action";

(3) paragraph (1)(B) is amended—

(A) by inserting "(i)" after "(B)".

(B) by inserting "comparable" after "establish",

(C) by inserting "and negative case actions taken" after "payments", and

(D) by adding at the end the following new clause:

"(ii) The Secretary shall require a further investigation of those negative case actions selected for quality control review that are determined pursuant to such review to be correct for the reason given by the State, for the purpose of—

"(I) determining whether at the time of any such negative case action the family subject to such action included a child or children who met the definition of a 'dependent child' in section 406(a) or 407(a) and was not ineligible for aid under section 407 or under any provision of section 402 other than subsection (a)(14) thereof,

"(II) including such determinations in the data collection and review process under subparagraph (A), and in the development of the improved methodology for measuring the State's performance with respect to inappropriate denials and terminations of aid (as described in section 3(b) of the Act which amended this section in 1988), and

"(III) bringing to the attention of the State agency in appropriate cases the need for changes in policy and practice to ensure that children described in subdivision (I) will not be denied aid, for which they are or should be eligible under the State plan, because of the strict application and enforcement of the quality control program under this subsection or for any other reason which is technical in nature."; and

(4) paragraph (5)(A) is amended—

(A) by striking "and" after the comma at the end of clause (i),

(B) by adding "and" after the comma at the end of clause (ii),

(C) by inserting immediately after clause (ii) the following new clause:

"(iii) with respect to such State's erroneous negative case actions for such year (as defined in subparagraph (E)), the ratio of such erroneous case actions to its total number of negative case actions (as defined in subparagraph (D)) under the State plan for such year,";

(5) paragraph (5)(B) is amended by striking "and" after the semicolon;

(6) paragraph (5)(C) is amended by striking the period and inserting "; and"; and

(7) paragraph (5) is further amended by adding after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraphs:

or to otherwise dispose of an application without a determination of eligibility; and

"(E) the term 'erroneous negative case actions' means negative case actions in which the reason given by the State for the action was not correct or in which the State did not comply with applicable advance notice and hearing requirements.".

(b) DEVELOPMENT OF METHODOLOGY.—No later than 2 years after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, in consultation with the States, shall develop and report to the Congress an improved methodology for measuring a State's performance with respect to inappropriate denials and terminations of aid under the State plan approved under part A of title IV of the Social Security Act. Such methodology shall include recommendations for establishing the error rate tolerance level against which a State's performance on inappropriate denials and terminations should be measured, and for the sanctions that should be applied if a State's error rate for inappropriate denials and terminations exceeds that level.

(c) EXTENSION OF QUALITY CONTROL PROGRAM TO INCLUDE INAPPROPRIATE DENIALS AND TERMINATIONS.—Effective on the first day of the first calendar quarter which begins 1 year or more after the submission of the Secretary's report to the Congress under subsection (b) (unless the Congress has theretofore provided otherwise by law), paragraph (5)(C) of section 403(i) of the Social Security Act (as amended by the preceding provisions of this Act) is further amended by striking "underpayments to eligible families receiving assistance" and inserting "(i) underpayment to eligible families receiving assistance, and (ii) nonpayments to eligible families not receiving assistance due to erroneous negative case actions".

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. DODD, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. REID, and Mr. LEAHY):

S. 232. A bill to establish the American Conservation Corps, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

AMERICAN CONSERVATION CORPS ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I rise—for the fifth time in 8 years—to introduce legislation to create an American Conservation Corps [ACC]. I have pledged to keep at this until we get it right, and there are encouraging signs that we will do just that in the very near future.

The ACC is a program that will employ thousands of youth to perform much needed conservation and rehabilitation work on Federal, State, local, and Indian lands. Patterned after the highly successful Civilian Conservation Corps [CCC] of the New Deal era, the ACC would provide year-round and summer employment opportunities for disadvantaged youths between ages 16 and 25.

As we are all painfully aware, two elements of the Great Depression still linger: youth employment and deterioriation of our natural resources. In my own State of New York, more than 54,000 youths aged 16 to 19 were unemployed in the first 9 months of 1988. Teens were almost three times as likely to be unemployed as all New Yorkers. One in six unemployed New Yorkers are teenagers. And this reflects a pattern of youth unemployment that plagues the country. Nationwide, in December 1988, 15 percent of Americans 16 to 19 were unemployed; 29.6 percent of black teenagers were unemployed; 1.2 million teens wanted but could not find work last month.

The legislation I introduce today is the same as passed the Senate during the final week of the 99th Congress as part of a bill to establish the Cuyahoga Valley National Recreation Area (H.R. 4645). The bill authorizes $75 million annually for fiscal years 1990–92; 80 percent of the funds are administered by the Department of Interior—Park Service lands 25 percent, Indian lands 5 percent, and State grants 50 percent—and 20 percent by the Department of Agriculture—Forest Service lands 15 percent, and other Federal agencies 5 percent. Fifty percent of the funds would be awarded to States and localities in the form of competitive grants. Awards would be based on: the size of the State's unemployed youth population; the conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement needs of the State's public lands; and local support for the program. States would be required to match the Federal funds, dollar for dollar.

State and local governments already have established some three dozen year-round or summertime conservation corps programs. The California Conservation Corps—the Nation's largest—employs 2,200 young men and women per year. The State of New York established its conservation corps last year with a modest budget of $1 million. The 1988 summer pilot program provided work opportunities for more than 500 New Yorkers between the ages of 14 and 18 at dozens of sites across the State. These programs prove that conservation programs are productive and beneficial to youth and the areas they serve.

Mr. President, I earlier referred to the ACC's tortuous legislative history. Permit me to explain. The measure was first introduced as the Public Lands Rehabilitation, Conservation and Improvement Act of 1981 (H.R. 4861). This bill was passed by the House on June 9, 1982, by a vote of 291 to 102. The House voted again, in December 1982, to approve the ACC, but the Senate did not act. Nor did the Senate act on S. 2061, a companion bill that Senator Mathias and I had introduced on February 3, 1982.

Thereafter, on the first day of the 98th Congress, Senator Mathias and I reintrodcued the ACC legislation as S. 27. Our measure attracted bipartisan support from 22 cosponsors. The House overwhelmingly approved a companion bill on March 1, 1983, by a vote of 301 to 87. On May 13, 1983, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee voted 18 to 1 to report H.R. 999 as a shell authorization bill, and Senator Mathias and I set about working with committee members to craft a compromise agreement to be offered as a substitute. Negotiations on the amendment, which was to delineate program details, required more than 1 year.

On October 3, 1984, the amendment was agreed to in the Senate by unanimous consent; 6 days later the Senate amendment was concurred to, and H.R. 99, as amended, was passed by the House by vote of 296 to 75. Yet despite such persistent support, President Reagan pocket vetoed the measure.

On January 3, 1985, this bill was again introduced in the House (H.R. 99), and was passed by a vote of 193-191 on July 11, 1985. On October 17, an amended version of S. 27 was offered as part of a floor amendment to H.R. 4645, a bill to establish the Cuyahoga Valley National Recreation Area. The amendment, and the bill as amended, were passed by unanimous consent. Unfortunately, Senator MCCLURE's amendment also included the provisions of a controversial bill to provide for competitive oil and gas leasing, provisions which the House found unacceptable. And so, Mr. President, the ACC once again failed to be enacted, despite the support of both Houses of Congress.

The bill I introduce today is the same text which passed the Senate during those waning hours of the 99th Congress. This time, I hope, we can finally do it right.

And that is not an unreasonable hope. A renewed interest in public service is permeating the national landscape. In May 1988, Representative MATT MARTINEZ, Representative LEON PANETTA, and Representative Mo UDALL began work on a new bill that combines elements of the American Conservation Corps with a National Youth Service Corps to assist youth in providing human services assistance to communities. Their bill contains a strong emphasis on educating disadvantaged program participants. Mr. DODD of Connecticut is now at work on a similar bill. The Democratic Leadership Council chaired by Mr. NUNN of Georgia issued a report calling for the creation of a citizens corps, describing it as a voluntary system of national service designed to create new opportunities to serve each other and their country. President Bush has also proposed a voluntary service program. Clearly a consensus is building that the nation's youth has something to give and something to gain from establishing programs like the American Conservation Corps.

We have estimated that the ACC would provide jobs for approximately 28,000 youths annually. The legislation specifically directs the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture to make special efforts in recruiting and employing economically, socially, educationally, and physically disadvantaged youths at an hourly salary just below minimum wage.

The array of available work includes wildlife habitat and conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement; urban revitalization; recreational area development and maintenance; road and trail maintenance and improvement; erosion, flood, drought, and storm damage control; insect, disease, rodent, and fire prevention and control; and improvement of abandoned railroad beds and rights of way; and energy conservation projects.

Mr. President, it is not often we have the ability to enact legislation that will unequivocally produce successful results. The Young Adult Conservation Corps returned $1.20 in appraised conservation work for each $1 expended. The YCC returned $1.04. State programs have done even better. The budget deficit looms, but so does the future of the youth of this country.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(B) Special efforts shall be made to recruit and enroll individuals who, at the time of enrollment, are economically disadvantaged.

(C) In addition to recruitment enrollment efforts required in subparagraph (B), the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall make special efforts to recruit enrollees who are socially, physically, and educationally disadvantaged youths.

(D) Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), a limited number of special corps members may be enrolled without regard to their age so that the corps may draw upon their special skills which may contribute to the attainment of their purposes of the Act.

(2) Except in the case of a program limited to the months of June, July, and August, individuals who at the time of applying for enrollment have attained 16 years of age but not attained 19 years of age, and who are no longer enrolled in any secondary school shall not be enrolled unless they give adequate written assurances, under criteria to be established by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, that they did not leave school for the express purpose of enrolling. The regulations promulgated under section 4(b) shall provide such criteria.

(3) The selection of enrollees to serve in the American Conservation Corps shall be the responsibility of the chief administrator of the program agency. Enrollees shall be selected from those qualified persons who have applied to, or been recruited by, the program agency, a State employment security service, a local school district with an employment referral service, an administrative entity under the Job Training Partnership Act, a community or community-based nonprofit organization, the sponsor of an Indian program, or the sponsor of a migrant or seasonal farmworker program.

(4)(A) Except for a program limited to the months of June, July, and August, any qualified individual selected for enrollment may be enrolled for a period not to exceed 24 months. When the term of enrollment does not consist of one continuous 24-month term, the total of shorter terms may not exceed 24 months.

(B) No individual may remain enrolled in the American Conservation Corps after that individual has attained the age of 26 years, except as provided in subsection (a)(1)(D) of this section.

(5) Within the American Conservation Corps the directors of programs shall establish and stringently enforce standards of conduct to promote proper moral and disciplinary conditions. Enrollees who violate these standards shall be transferred to other locations, or dismissed, if it is determined that their retention in that particular program, or in the Corps, will jeopardize the enforcement of such standards or diminish the opportunities of other enrollees. Such disciplinary measures will be subject to expeditious appeal to the appropriate Secretary.

(b) SERVICES, FACILITIES, SUPPLIES.—The program agency shall provide facilities, quarters, and board (in the case of residential facilities), limited and emergency medical care, transportation from administrative facilities to work sites, and other appropriate services, supplies, and equipment. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture may provide services, facilities, supplies, and equipment to any program agency carrying out projects under this Act. Whenever possible, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall make arrangements with the Secretary of Defense to have logistical support provided by a military installation near the work site, including the provision of temporary tent centers where needed, and other supplies and equipment. Basic standards of work requirements, health, nutrition, sanitation, and safety for all projects shall be established and enforced.

(c) REQUIREMENT OF PAYMENT FOR CERTAIN SERVICES.—Enrollees shall be required to pay a reasonable portion of the cost of room and board provided at residential facilities into rollover funds administered by the appropriate program agency. Such payments and rates are to be established after evaluation of costs of providing the services. The rollover funds established pursuant to this section shall be used solely to defray the costs of room and board for enrollees. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Defense are authorized to make available to program agencies surplus food and equipment as may be available from Federal programs.

SEC. 6. FEDERAL AND STATE EMPLOYEE STATUS.

Enrollees, crew leaders, and volunteers are deemed as being responsible to, or the responsibility of, the program agency administering the project on which they work. Except as otherwise specifically provided in the following paragraphs, enrollees and crew leaders in projects for which funds have been authorized pursuant to section 13 shall not be deemed Federal employees and should not be subject to the provisions of law relating to Federal employment:

(1) For purposes of subchapter I of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the compensation of Federal employees for work injuries, enrollees and crew leaders serving American Conservation Corps program agencies shall be deemed employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in section 8101 of title 5, United States Code, and the provision of that subchapter shall apply, except—

(A) the term "performance of duty" shall not include any act of an enrollee or crew leader while absent from his or her assigned post of duty, except while participating in an activity authorized by or under the direction and supervision of a program agency (including an activity while on pass or during travel to or from such post of duty); and

(B) compensation for disability shall not begin to accrue until the day following the date on which the injured enrollee's or crew leader's employment is terminated.

(2) For purposes of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims procedure, enrollees and crew leaders on American Conservation Corps projects shall be deemed employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee of the Government" as defined in section 2671 of title 28, United States Code.

(3) For purposes of section 5911 of title 5, United States Code, relating to allowances for quarters, enrollees and crew leaders shall be deemed employees of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in that section.

The use of volunteer services permitted by this section shall be subject to the condition that such use does not result in the displacement of any enrollee.

SEC. 8. TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY.

The Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority may accept the services of volunteers and provide for their incidental expenses to carry out any activity of the Tennessee Valley Authority except policymaking or law or regulatory enforcement. Such volunteers shall not be deemed employees of the United States Government except for the purposes of chapter 81 of title 5 of the United States Code, relating to compensation for work injuries, and shall not be deemed employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority except for the purposes of tort claims of the same extent as a regular employee of the Tennessee Valley Authority would be under identical circumstances.

SEC. 9. SPECIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

(a) PAY.—(1) The rate of pay for enrollees shall be the equivalent of 95 percent of the pay rate for members of the Armed Forces in the enlisted grade E-1 who have served for four months or more on active duty, from which a reasonable charge for enrollee room and board shall be deducted by the program agency.

(2) Enrollees shall receive $50 cash incentive stipends for every three months of enrollment in the program.

(3) The rate of pay for crew leaders shall be at a wage comparable to the compensation in effect for grades GS-3 to GS-7.

Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior shall submit a report to the Congress containing the results of the study carried out under this section. The report shall include cost estimates and recommendations for any legislative action.

(f) STUDY.—(1) Program agencies shall not use more than 10 percent of the funds available to them to provide training and educational materials and services for enrollees and may enter into arrangements with academic institutions or education providers, including local education agencies, community colleges, 4-year colleges, area vocational-technical schools and community based organizations, for academic study by enrollees during nonworking hours to upgrade literacy skills, obtain a high school diploma or its equivalency, or college degrees, or enhance employable skills. Enrollees who have not obtained a high school diploma or its equivalency shall have priority to receive services under this subsection. Whenever possible, an enrollee seeking study or training not provided at his or her assigned facility shall be offered assignment to a facility providing such study or training.

The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and submit to the President and to the Congress at least once each year a report detailing the activities carried out under this Act in the preceding fiscal year. Such report shall be submitted not later than December 31 of each year following the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 11. LABOR MARKET INFORMATION.

The Secretary of Labor shall make available to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture and to any program agency under this Act such labor market information as is appropriate for use in carrying out the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 12. EMPLOYEE APPEAL RIGHTS.

(a) FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.—In the case of—

(1) the displacement of a Federal employee (including any partial displacement through reduction of nonovertime hours, wages, or employment benefits) or the failure to reemploy an employee in a layoff status, contrary to a certification under section 13(c) (1) or (2), or

(2) the displacement of such a Federal employee by reason of the use of one or more volunteers under section 7 of this Act, such employee is entitled to appeal such action to the Merit Systems Protection Board under section 7701 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) OTHER INDIVIDUALS.—In the case of—

(1) the displacement of any other individual employed (either directly or under contract with any private contractor) by a program agency or grantee, or the failure to reemploy an employee in layoff status, contrary to a certification under section 13(c) (1) or (2), or

(2) the displacement of such individual by reason of the use of one or more volunteers under section 7 of this Act, the requirements contained in section 144 of the Job Training Partnership Act (Public Law 97-300) shall apply, and such individual shall be deemed an interested person for purposes of the application of such requirements.

(c) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this section, the term "displacement" includes, but is not limited to, any partial displacement through reduction of nonovertime hours, wages, or employment benefits.

SEC. 13. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS.—Of the sums appropriated pursuant to subsection (g) to carry out this Act for any fiscal year—

(1) not less than 50 percent shall be made available to the Secretary of the Interior for expenditure by State program agencies which have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior for participation in the American Conservation Corps;

(2) not less than 15 percent shall be made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for expenditure by agencies within the Department of Agriculture, subject to the provisions of subsection (e);

(3) not less than 5 percent shall be made available to the Secretary of Agriculture, under such terms as are provided for in regulations promulgated under section 4(b), for expenditure by other Federal agencies;

(4) not less than 25 percent shall be made available to the Secretary of the Interior for expenditure by agencies within the Department of the Interior, subject to the provisions of subsection (e), and for demonstration projects or projects of special merit carried out by any program agency or by any nonprofit organization or local government which is undertaking or proposing to undertake projects consistent with the purposes of this Act; and

(5) not less than 5 percent shall be made available to the Secretary of the Interior for expenditure by the governing bodies of participating Indian tribes.

(b) AWARD OF GRANTS.—Within 60 days after enactment of appropriations legislation pursuant to subsection (g), any program agency may apply to the Secretary of the Interior for funds under this Act. In determining the allocation of funds among the program agencies, the Secretary shall consider each of the following factors:

(1) The proportion of the unemployed youth population of the State.

(2) The conservation, rehabilitation, and improvement needs on public lands within the State.

(3) The amount of other support for the program and the extent to which the size and effectiveness of a program will be enhanced by the use of the Federal funds.

Any State receiving funds for the operation of any program under this Act shall be required to provide not less than 50 percent of the cost of such program.

(c) NON-DISPLACEMENT.—The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall not fund any program or enter into any agreement with any program agency for the funding of any program under this Act unless the Secretary concerned or such agency certifies that projects carried out by the program will not—

(1) result in the displacement of individuals currently employed (either directly or under contract with any private contractor) by the program agency concerned (including partial displacement through reduction of nonovertime hours, wages, or employment benefits);

(2) result in the employment of any individual when any other person is in a layoff status from the same or substantially equivalent job within the jurisdiction of the program agency concerned;

(3) impair existing contracts for services; or

(4) result in the inability of persons who normally contract with the agency for carrying out projects involving forestry, nursery, or silvicultural operations on commercial forest land to continue to obtain contracts to carry out such projects.

For purposes of paragraph (4), the term "commercial forest land" means land in the National Forest System or land administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management which is producing, or is capable of producing, 50 cubic feet per acre per year of industrial wood and which is not withdrawn from timber utilization by statute or administrative decision.

(d) STATE SHARE TO LOCAL GOVERNMENTS.—If, at the commencement of any fiscal year, any State does not have a program agency designated by the Governor to manage the program in that State, then during such fiscal year any local government within such State may establish a program agency to carry out the program within the political subdivision which is under the jurisdiction of such local government. Such local government program agency shall be in all respects subject to the same requirements as a State program agency. Where more than one local government within a State has established a program agency under this subsection, the Secretary of the Interior shall allocate funds between such agencies in such manner as he deems equitable.

(e) PROGRAMS ON FEDERAL LANDS.—Funds provided under this section to any Federal agency shall be used to carry out projects on Federal lands and to provide for the Federal administrative costs of implementing this Act. In utilizing such funds, the Federal agencies may enter into contracts or other agreements with program agencies and with local governments and nonprofit organizations approved under section 4(h).

(f) PAYMENT TERMS.—Payments under grants under this section may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement and at such intervals and on such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, as appropriate, finds necessary.

(g) USE OF FUNDS.—Contract authority under this Act shall be subject to the availability of appropriations. Funds provided under this Act shall only be used for activities which are in addition to those which would otherwise be carried out in the area in the absence of such funds. Not more than 10 percent of the funds made available to any program agency for projects during each fiscal year may be used for the purchase of major capital equipment.

(h) ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES.—The regulations under section 4(b) shall establish appropriate limitations on the administrative expenses of Federal agencies and program agencies carrying out programs under this Act. Such limitations shall insure that administrative expenses of such programs shall be minimized to the extent practicable taking into consideration the purposes of this Act and the nature of the programs carried out under this Act.

(i) APPROPRIATION LEVELS.—There is authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of carrying out this Act $75,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990 through 1992. Funds appropriated under this Act shall remain available until expended.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 233. A bill entitled the "Hazardous Wastes and Human Health Survey Act"; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

HAZARDOUS WASTES AND HUMAN HEALTH SURVEY ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I introduce the Hazardous Wastes and Human Health Survey Act of 1989. This legislation directs the National Academy of Sciences, through its National Research Council, to undertake a survey of Love Canal in New York, the Stringfellow Acid Pits in California, Times Beach in Missouri, and other representative examples of hazardous wastes sites in this country to determine what we know and do not know about these sites' and their effect on human health.

Now, although it has been almost two decades since the passage of our major environmental statutes such as the National Environmental Policy Act, Safe Drinking Water Act, Clean Water Act, Superfund, and others, environmental epidemiology remains a nascent scientific specialty. Environmental epidemiology can be defined as the study of defined populations or communities exposed to different ambient environments so as to clarify the relationships between such environmental factors and human health. This is a challenging area of investigation, because it is exceedingly difficult to isolate causes and effects with human populations. For example, is lung cancer in an individual caused by exposure to airborne carcinogens in the workplace, or residence near an industrial plant emitting toxic fumes, or by the individual's habit of smoking? Scientists must struggle to draw inferences despite problems such as exposure to multiple agents, small population sample sizes, "confounders" which skew statistical results, and long latency periods for certain diseases and effects, all arrayed against humans' complex genetic makeups and their changing physical environments.

In a report first published in 1983 by the National Academy of Sciences, it was noted that fewer than 30 agents are definitely linked with cancer in humans—while some 1,500 substances are reportedly carcinogenic in animal tests (although some of these testing methods are questionable). Only about 7,000 of the over 5,000,000 known substances have ever been tested for carcinogenicity. The report goes on to say that we know even less about other human health effects which stem from environmental hazards such as dangers to neurological, immunological and reproductive systems in humans.

Now there are obvious ethical reasons that dictate why we must rely on animal studies for much of out data. But the Government has a responsibility to the public who lived, played and worked in places like Love Canal and Times Beach to provide the best information possible on the health effects from these sites. On December 9, 1988, an editorial in the New York Times discussed the pollution problems stemming from the Department of Defense lax policies at its energy facilities such as Fernald, OH. I quote:

Residents near some plants blame release of radioactive materials for their illnesses. These compliants merit concern. But no one can know if the illnesses have any connection with the plant operations, or are just fortuitious, until the completion of epidemiological studies by the Centers for Disease Control.

A good beginning at informing the public has been made with the new community right-to-know provisions in the Superfund amendments passed by the 99th Congress. These amendments will help to ensure that from now on, companies will have to report to the communities around their facilities what types of environmental hazards are stored or released. But the bill which I am offering today concentrates on improving the science of epidemiology and its application by the Federal Government.

It is not enough to have fragmented, anecdotal information about health effects on citizens living near hazardous waste sites. After 8 years and $1.5 billion spent under Superfund, there is still disagreement about the effectiveness of our cleanups. At sites such as Love Canal, valuable opportunities to gather and analyze data were lost due to poorly designed studies and lack of coordination among Government agencies. Are we doing enough? Are our priorities correct in terms of protecting public health and the environment? We have been unable to find even one comprehensive epidemiological study at a Superfund site which most scientists would regard as authoritative.

This bill orders the National Academy of Sciences to survey these hazardous sites and report to Congress on the state of our knowledge about epidemiology, and recommend what Federal programs, methods, and protocols should be put in place to guarantee that Federal, State, and local government officials and the public they are responsible to have the information they need to make informed choices. We cannot afford to do less.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill introduced be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 233

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Hazardous Wastes and Human Health Survey Act of 1989."

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) The Nation's environmental statutes such as the Clean Water Act, Clean Air Act, Safe Drinking Water Act, Toxic Substances Control Act, Superfund, and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act were enacted in order to prevent and to remedy damage from pollution and to protect public health and the environment;

(2) Although it has been nearly two decades since the passage of major environmental statutes, and despite measurable improvements in environmental quality, environmental epidemiology remains a nascent scientific specialty;

(3) In order to establish priorities for environmental regulation, Federal, State and Local Government officials need better information about the health effects of environmental contaminants;

(4) So as to fulfill their obligation to protect the health and welfare of their citizens, Federal, State and Local Governments need information about the long and short term effects on human health of exposure to environmental hazards;

(5) Although apparently serious environmental degradation and releases have occurred at such sites as Love Canal in New York, Stringfellow Acid Pits in California, Times Beach in Missouri, and others, too little is known about the short and long term effects of these occurrences on people who were exposed or who continue to be exposed;

(6) Opportunities for informed scientific analysis were lost at many of these sites because government direction was lacking, and because protocols were not in place for sustained research and follow up studies with the result that information on health impacts is fragmented and anecdotal;

(7) As part of assessing the human health risks associated with hazardous wastes sites, more study is needed of the risks such sites pose when compared with other environmental hazards, such as the misuse of pesticides and contamination of ground water, and with other types of risk both voluntary and involuntary which humans encounter in everyday life;

(b) In accordance with subsection (a) the Congress declares that the National Academy of Sciences, National Research Council (hereinafter referred to as the "Academy" and "Council" respectively) undertake a study and make a report to Congress within eighteen months of enactment of this statute, with an interim report within twelve months of enactment of this statute. The Academy's report shall:

(1) review the three sites listed in subsection (a)(5) as well as any other representative sites chosen by NAS as case studies and determine whether any epidemiologic studies were begun or continued, what the quality and reliability of data and analysis gathered and from such studies is and what gaps remain in information necessary to make informed policy choices about human health effects (including carcinogenic, neurologic, immunologic, reproductive and other relevant risks) at these sites;

(2) describe in the interim report to Congress required by subsection (b) in accurate terms nevertheless comprehensible to informed laypersons, the general problems inherent in epidemiologic studies including but not limited to problems of defining and identifying markers of exposure, assessing changing environments in which humans live and work, determining the full consequence of exposure on human health, dealing with exposure to multiple agents, drawing inferences from small populations, following populations for adequate time periods, expressing results in terms of reliability, costs of data collection and analysis, and other associated technical and ethical problems;

(3) provide in the final report to Congress required by subsection (b) a critical survey of what has been learned through environmental epidemiology about the effects of hazardous waste sites on human health, an evaluation of the need to develop data bases and one or more national clearinghouses at federal agencies of information in the field, a description of research gaps, needs and priorities, and recommendations on programs, methods or protocols which federal agencies should undertake or employ at hazardous waste sites to ensure that useful data is collected and analyzed and that accurate information is disseminated to the public.

(c) In preparing the report ordered by subsection (b) the Academy shall consult with the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry of the Center for Disease Control, the Environmental Protection Agency, and any other Federal agencies which the Academy determines have useful expertise to contribute to this report. The Academy shall make use of its own or other Federal agencies' pertinent past or ongoing studies and programs, such as the Environmental Protection Agency's "Community Right-to-Know" program under Superfund in developing the report. Moreover, the Academy shall consult with State and local officials, public representatives and citizen groups at the sites studied for the report, in order to gain an understadning of their experiences with epidemiologic studies and need for information.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Natinal Academy of Sciences the sum of $2,000,000 to remain available until expended.

By Mr. GLENN (for himself, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 235. A bill to protect the rights of persons to due process of law and equal protection of the laws in guardianship proceedings; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL GUARDIANSHIP RIGHTS ACT

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, today, along with my colleagues, Senators SIMON and INOUYE, I am introducing S. 235, the National Guardianship Rights Act of 1989. This legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives by the Honorable CLAUDE PEPPER, chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging's Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care. Our legislation would provide greater protection against abuse for the nearly 500,000 elderly and disabled Americans who are under guardianship.

Being under guardianship means that a persons legal rights, possessions and decisionmaking power have been transferred to another person because a court has determined the person is unable to handle his or her own affairs. While guardianships are handled by the States, usually through the probate courts, recent reports by the Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care and the Associated Press suggest that there is an important role for the Federal Government to play by ensuring minimum standards in all guardianship systems.

According to these reports, action is needed to reform the process by which guardians are appointed and to monitor the activities of guardians on behalf of their wards. The National Guardianship Rights Act of 1989 addresses many of the problems that have been documented, including the following:

Lack of notification to an individual that someone is petitioning the court to have a guardian appointed for that individual;

Use of advanced age as significant criteria for a finding of incapacity and issuance of a guardianship order;

Lack of consideration of medical evidence in determining incapacity;

No requirement that an alleged incapacitated individual be present when a guardianship proceeding takes place;

No standards for becoming a guardian; and Lack of oversight of the actions taken by guardians.

The National Guardianship Rights Act of 1989 establishes Federal requirements so that all States must provide due process protections in guardianship proceedings, in accordance with the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution; and it establishes rights regarding the appointment of competent and trained guardians and regarding reconsiderations of determinations of incapacity. Specific requirements include the following:

Providing notice to the potential ward that a court hearing on guardianship is being held;

Informing that person he or she must be present and represented by legal counsel;

That there be minimum standards of character and training for those who serve as guardians;

The elderly persons be given a clear and concise explanation of their rights under guardianship;

Continued supervision by the court of the conduct of guardians; and

The right to appeal the guardianship by the person deemed incapacitated.

States would be required to demonstrate compliance with this act by submitting a State implementation plan to the Attorney General not less than once every 2 years. Failure to comply substantially with any provision of this act would result in a withholding of Federal payments to the State.

Guardianship is an important issue—one that is tied to our concern about long-term care for our growing elderly population, particularly the very old. Many of these people may need some assistance, not because they are old but because they are in very poor physical or mental health. However, their civil liberties should not be taken from them without very good justification and without due process. And when a guardian is appointed, there should be an assurance that this person is highly qualified and that their actions will be monitored to ensure that they are in the best interests of the person they have been appointed to protect. The National Guardianship Rights Act of 1989, legislation which sets Federal standards for the States to follow, addresses these important issues, and I look forward to its passage by the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 235

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Guardianship Rights Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds the following:

(1) DENIAL OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROTECTIONS.—Thousands of individuals in the United States are being denied, through the imposition of guardianship orders, due process of law and equal protection of the laws as guaranteed under the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(2) REMOVAL OF RIGHTS.—Individuals in the United States subject to guardianship orders typically retain fewer rights than are retained by convicted felons, since most guardianship orders remove from the individual basic rights such as the rights to vote, own property, marry, consent to medical treatment, and contract.

(3) SEVERITY OF ACTION AGAINST INDIVIDUAL.—A guardianship order is one of the most severe legal actions that can be taken against an individual in the United States and involves restricting or removing the rights of an individual, often without the individual being present or having the benefit of legal representation.

(4) DIFFICULTY OF DISSOLUTION.—While a guardianship order can be secured with relative ease, the dissolution of a guardianship order is often very difficult, leaving protected persons vulnerable to abuse and with little means of recourse to address their grievances.

(5) LACK OF PROTECTION UNDER STATE LAW.—State laws generally have failed to provide adequate protections against unwarranted and overly restrictive guardianship orders, appointment of unfit guardians, and abusive practices by guardians, as illustrated by the following:

(A) NOTICE OF GUARDIANSHIP PROCEEDING.—Several States lack a requirement that an alleged incapacitated individual be notified that someone is petitioning the court to have a guardian appointed for the individual, and many other States routinely allow waiver of the notice requirements.

(B) ADVANCED AGE AS BASIS FOR INCAPACITY.—In 33 States, the advanced age of an individual is sufficient cause for a finding of incapacity and issuance of a guardianship order.

(C) MEDICAL EVIDENCE OF INCAPACITY.—Only 12 States require consideration of medical evidence of the incapacity of an individual before the individual may be determined to be legally incapacitated and subject to a guardianship order.

(D) PRESENCE AT PROCEEDING.—Only 16 States require that an alleged incapacitated individual be present when a guardianship proceeding takes place.

(E) STANDARDS FOR GUARDIANS.—No State has minimum standards of experience, education, or intelligence for becoming a guardian.

(F) PROHIBITION ON FELONS AS GUARDIANS.—Only 5 States prohibit convicted felons from being appointed as guardians.

(G) OVERSIGHT OF GUARDIANSHIP ORDERS.—Courts that issue guardianship orders rarely conduct any followup check regarding the orders.

(H) REPORT BY GUARDIANS.—Only half of the States require the filing of an annual report regarding the well-being of the protected person.

(I) ACCOUNTING BY GUARDIANS.—6 States lack a requirement that the guardian provide an accounting of the assets of the protected person.

(6) NECESSITY OF CONGRESSIONAL ACTION.—Because many States have violated the prohibition of the 14th amendment to the Constitution against deprivation of the life, liberty, or property of any person without due process of law by allowing the deprivation of personal liberty and lack of control of the property of an individual resulting from a finding of incapacity, it is necessary for the Congress to establish national standards for the protection of the rights of alleged incapacitated individuals.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to enforce the guarantee of the 14th amendment that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, as relates to alleged incapacitated individuals, by establishing national standards for the protection of alleged incapacitated individuals and guardianship proceedings involving alleged incapacitated individuals.

SEC. 3. BASIC RIGHTS OF ALLEGED INCAPACITATED INDIVIDUALS.

(a) RIGHT TO NOTICE.—An alleged incapacitated individual and the family of an alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right to be promptly notified that a guardianship petition commencing a guardianship action has been filed and to be fully informed of the potential legal consequences of the filing, as follows:

(1) SERVICE.—

(A) ALLEGED INCAPACITATED INDIVIDUAL.—Notice of a guardianship proceeding shall be personally served on the alleged incapacitated individual not less than 30 working days before the proceeding.

(B) FAMILY OF ALLEGED INCAPACITATED INDIVIDUAL.—Notice of a guardianship proceeding shall be personally served or served by mail, not less than 30 working days before the proceeding, on any spouse, custodian, proposed guardian, adult son or daughter, and parent of the alleged incapacitated individual (if their locations are known or readily determinable).

(2) CONTENTS.—Notice under this subsection shall include the following:

(A) DATE, TIME, AND PLACE OF PROCEEDING.—A statement of the date, time, and place of the guardianship proceeding.

(B) DEFENSE RIGHTS OF ALLEGED INCAPACITATED INDIVIDUAL.—A clear and easily readable statement explaining each of the rights of the alleged incapacitated individual that are established in sections 3 and 4.

(C) TRANSFER OF LEGAL RIGHTS.—A detailed explanation of the potential legal effects on the alleged incapacitated of a guardianship order and a listing and explanation of each of the legal rights of the alleged incapacitated individual that could be restricted or transferred to a guardian by a guardianship order, including, if applicable, the rights to—

(i) marry or divorce;

(ii) vote or hold elected office;

(iii) enter into a contract or make or revoke a will;

(iv) sue and be sued, other than through the guardian;

(v) appoint an agent;

(vi) personally apply for government benefits;

(vii) possess a license to drive;

(viii) own, buy, sell, mortgage, or lease property;

(ix) determine where to reside;

(x) consent to or refuse medical treatment;

(xi) determine who shall provide personal care or assistance;

(xii) travel; and

(xiii) make decisions regarding social environment and other social aspects in the life of the individual.

(3) PROHIBITION OF WAIVER.—An alleged incapacitated individual may not waive the right to notice under this subsection.

(b) RIGHT TO CONVENIENT FORUM.—An alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right to have a guardianship action brought in the county in which the alleged incapacitated individual resides unless the court orders the action to be brought in another specified county. The court may enter an order under this subsection only upon a finding that extreme hardship or prejudice will result to the alleged incapacitated individual unless the action is brought in another specified county, pursuant to a motion by the party alleging incapacity or the alleged incapacitated individual.

(c) RIGHT TO PRESENCE AT PROCEEDING.—

(1) PRESENCE UNLESS INABILITY TO ATTEND.—An alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right to be present at all guardianship proceedings relating to the alleged incapacitated individual unless both of the following occur:

(A) DISABILITY.—The alleged incapacitated individual is unable by disability to attend.

(B) DISABILITY ESTABLISHED.—The inability of the alleged incapacitated individual to attend is established by the independent professional guardianship evaluation team appointed by the court under subsection (e), if the alleged incapacitated individual requested an evaluation team under subsection (e); or

(2) LOCATION OF HEARING.—The court may, in the case of an alleged incapacitated individual whose inability to attend a guardianship proceeding has been established under paragraph (1)(B), conduct the guardianship proceeding at the location of the alleged incapacitated individual.

(1) IN GENERAL.—An alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right to be represented by counsel in a guardianship proceeding. A guardianship proceeding may not be held without counsel for the alleged incapacitated individual unless the alleged incapacitated individual waives the right to counsel under paragraph (4).

(2) COURT-PROVIDED COUNSEL.—An alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right to have the court provide counsel to represent the alleged incapacitated individual when the alleged incapacitated individual is unable to obtain representation by other means. Counsel shall be provided not less than 20 working days before the guardianship proceeding.

(3) ROLE OF COUNSEL.—Counsel for the alleged incapacitated individual shall act as an advocate for the individual, and shall advise the alleged incapacitated individual in a manner likely to be understood by the individual of all legal options available in a guardianship action and the consequences of such options. Counsel shall zealously advocate the option selected by the alleged incapacitated individual. Counsel shall not act in the role of guardian ad litem of the alleged incapacitated individual.

(4) WAIVER.—The alleged incapacitated individual may waive the right to be represented by counsel only if the alleged incapacitated individual is present at the guardianship proceeding and the waiver is knowing and voluntary.

(e) RIGHT TO INDEPENDENT PROFESSIONAL GUARDIANSHIP EVALUATION TEAM.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—An alleged incapacitated individual shall have the right, upon the request of the alleged incapacitated individual or counsel for the individual (not less than 20 working days before the guardianship proceeding), to have the court appoint an independent professional guardianship evaluation team to examine the alleged incapacitated individual named in the petition and report to the court regarding the alleged incapacitated individual. If requested, the court shall appoint the evaluation team not less than 15 working days before the guardianship proceeding.

(2) PROHIBITION OF INTERESTED INDIVIDUALS.—The court may not appoint to the evaluation team an individual who is related to or involved in a business relationship with any party to the guardianship action.

(3) MEMBERSHIP.—An evaluation team shall consist of the following:

(A) PSYCHIATRIST OR PHYSICIAN.—Not less than 1 licensed psychiatrist or other physician who is skilled in evaluating the particular area of incapacity alleged of the alleged incapacitated individual.

(B) SOCIAL WORKER.—Not less than 1 licensed professional social worker.

(C) OTHER PROFESSIONALS.—Any other professional individuals that the court may consider appropriate, including, but not limited to geriatricians, gerontologists, nurses, community health workers, disability workers, and habilitators.

(4) EXAMINATION.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—If an evaluation team is requested under paragraph (1), each member of the evaluation team shall conduct, not later than 10 working days before the guardianship proceeding and in person, an examination of the alleged incapacitated individual. The counsel for the alleged incapacitated individual, upon request to the court, shall be entitled to notification of and presence at the examination.

(B) LOCATION.—The examination shall take place, whenever possible, at the location or usual environment of the alleged incapacitated individual.

(C) MANNER.—The examination shall be conducted, whenever possible, in a manner designed not to offend the privacy or dignity of the alleged incapacitated individual.

(5) REPORT.—If an evaluation team is requested under paragraph (1), the evaluation team shall submit (not less than 5 working days before the guardianship proceeding) to the court, the alleged incapacitated individual, and the counsel for the alleged incapacitated individual, if any, a written report explaining in detail the results of the examination. The report shall include a statement of capacity and functional limitations and capabilities of the alleged incapacitated individual and the specific behavioral manifestations that form the basis for the determination regarding the capacity.

(6) EFFECT OF FINDING ON GUARDIANSHIP ACTION.—

(A) DISMISSAL.—If the evaluation team determines, based on the evaluation under paragraph (4), that the alleged incapacitated individual is not incapacitated in any area, the court shall dismiss the guardianship action without delay.

(B) REQUIRED AMENDMENT.—If the evaluation team determines that the alleged incapacitated individual is incapacitated in any area other than the areas specified in the guardianship petition, the court shall instruct the petitioner to amend the petition accordingly. If the petition is not so amended, the court shall dismiss the guardianship action.

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 236. A bill to regulate above ground storage tanks used to store regulated substances; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

REGULATION OF ABOVE GROUND STORAGE TANKS

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to close a large and dangerous loophole in Federal hazardous waste law. At issue is the regulation of above ground tanks used in the storage of petroleum and other hazardous liquids. Current law regulates only underground petroleum facilities. My legislation will amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to provide the Environmental Protection Agency with the authority to oversee and enforce the maintenance of above ground storage tanks as well.

This correction in environmental law is long overdue. Congress has mandated the regulation of underground storage facilities since 1984 with the passage of the Resources Conservation and Recovery Act [RCRA]. This authority was expanded by the Superfund authorization in 1986, but still the problem of above ground tank regulation remains.

This is a significant problem with serious human and environmental ramifications. I will remind my colleagues of two prominent consequences of this regulatory oversight.

On January 2, 1988, a collapsed storage tank in Floreffe, PA, dumped approximately 750,000 gallons of No. 2 diesel fuel into the Monongahela River. The fuel, which entered the river quickly by rushing over protective berms and through storm sewer drains, required more than 150 people, 11 vacuum trucks, 3 cranes and more than 20,000 feet of river boom to attempt to stem the spread of the toxic fuel. Dozens of communities were without drinking water for days, and the long-term ecological and groundwater effects of the spill are yet to be determined.

Less than 2 years before the Ashland spill made national headlines, a similar mishap occurred in my home State of South Dakota. In September of 1986, it was discovered in Sioux Falls that at least 20,000 gallons of gasoline had slowly leaked from an aboveground storage tank owned by the Williams Pipeline Co. The spill was not discovered until the Skunk Creek acquifer—a secondary water source for the community—had been contaminated. Moreover, gasoline fumes had infiltrated a neighborhood elementary school to the point where the school had to be evacuated. The building has since been condemned.

A second petroleum spill, this one of 8,000 gallons, was reported at the Williams site in Sioux Falls on March 11, 1987. This spill immediately soaked into the ground and was floating on the acquifer within hours. Since these 2 spills were discovered, it has since been determined that there had been 11 leaks and spills, totaling thousands of gallons, at the Sioux Falls tank farm alone.

The EPA is currently reviewing a portion of the Williams site for possible inclusion on the Superfund national priorities list. The padlocks of the condemned Hayward Elementary School and dozens of orange flags marking petroleum test wells in the back yards of area residents are a poignant reminder of one company's negligence, and glaringly deficient Federal laws.

The Williams site in Sioux Falls, and the Ashland spill in Pennsylvania, are not isolated incidents. In South Dakota alone, there were 127 petroleum spills last year, many coming from unregulated above-ground storage tanks. I suspect this problem exists in every State in the Nation. Built in the 1950's—with an estimated life span of 30 to 40 years—tank farms all across America have turned into ticking environmental time bombs.

We must ask ourselves, how much longer can we afford to wait? How many more millions of clean-up dollars must we spend before we take preventative action?

State and local officials do not have the resources or the expertise to monitor all above-ground tanks suspected of possible leaks, or to oversee complex cleanup efforts. The one agency that does have the resources and expertise—the EPA—lacks statutory authority to provide any assistance to threatened communities, unless the contamination qualifies for Superfund cleanup. Had EPA had the authority to monitor above ground petroleum storage tanks 2 years ago as they do under RCRA with underground storage tanks, then the mishaps in Pennsylvania, South Dakota and elsewhere very well might have been averted.

The legislation I am introducing today would establish a comprehensive approach to deal with this serious problem. The emphasis of the legislation is on the prevention of future petroleum spills through the establishment of vigorous design and performance standards for above ground storage tanks. In addition, it would require the industry to develop methods for the early detection of hazardous liquid releases and to keep records of their detection methods in an effort to discover discharges before they reach the crisis stage. It would also require the storage industry to report all releases and take immediate corrective actions when releases do occur. In these instances, the legislation would require that the responsible party pay for the entire cleanup and for any population relocation that may be necessary. Furthermore, the legislation would require EPA or the qualified State agencies to ensure that the spill is recovered swiftly and completely.

My legislation would apply to aboveground storage tanks larger than 1,100 gallons, with certain specific exceptions as stated in the bill. I want to stress that even relatively small tanks of a few thousand gallons can cause extreme damage. The experience in Sioux Falls is a dramatic example. Often, smaller tanks are used to store materials such as J-4 jet fuel, fertilizers, and various other types of hazardous materials that actually pose a greater health threat than many of the petroleum products stored in large tanks. At the Williams tank farm in Sioux Falls, 72 percent of the tanks have a capacity of less than 1 million gallons.

I introduce this legislation with the understanding that technical changes in the legislation may be necessary. For instance, I have included pipeline facilities under the authority of this bill. It may be necessary to sort out whether these facilities should be regulated under this bill or under exisiting pipeline safety legislation. I will consult with my colleagues and relevant governmental and nongovernmental bodies to come up with the best language possible, but I want to reiterate my commitment to having the problem of aboveground storage tanks solved.

Mr. President, if any of my colleagues doubt the need for regulation of aboveground storage tanks parallel to our regulation of underground tanks, I invite them to come with me to Sioux Falls, S.D. There, you can stand with me outside the 8-foot barbed wire fence that surrounds the Hayward Elementary School that now sits empty as an eerie memorial to the spills that the city has experienced. I will introduce you to landowners who have been turned down for bank loans because the value of their homes has plummeted to the point that the banks will no longer accept them as collateral for even modest loans. I will show you the place where pumps run 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, extracting gasoline from the water table while only a few feet away lie drinking water wells contaminated for generations to come.

To the people of Sioux Falls, SD, or Floreffe, PA, or countless other locations across America that could experience an aboveground storage tank spill tomorrow, there is no question that this legislation is important and long-overdue. It is time we recognize that a petroleum or hazardous liquid spill from an aboveground tank is equally dangerous to those from underground tanks. As they are equal in danger, we must control each in an equally effective and conscientious manner. I urge my colleagues to join me in preventing the degradation of our environment and the endangerment of our people from future above-ground storage tank spills.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the legislation and the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(d) FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY.—(1) Financial responsibility required by this subsection may be established in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Administrator by any one, or any combination, of the following: insurance, guarantee, surety bond, letter of credit, qualification as a self-insurer, or any other method satisfactory to the Administrator. In promulgating requirements under this subsection, the Administrator is authorized to specify policy or other contractual terms, conditions, or defenses, which are necessary or are unacceptable in establishing such evidence of financial responsibility in order to effectuate the purposes of this subtitle.

"(2) in any case where the owner or operator is in bankruptcy, reorganization, or arrangement, pursuant to the Federal Bankruptcy Code or where with reasonable diligence jurisdiction in any State court of the Federal courts cannot be obtained over an owner or operator likely to be solvent at the time of judgment, any claim arising from conduct for which evidence of financial responsibility must be provided under this subsection may be asserted directly against the guarantor providing such evidence of financial responsibility. In the case of any action pursuant to this paragraph such guarantor shall be entitled to invoke all rights and defenses which would have been available to the owner or operator if any action had been brought against the owner or operator by the claimant and which would have been available to the guarantor if an action had been brought against the guarantor by the owner or operator.

"(3) The total liability of any guarantor shall be limited to the aggregate amount which the guarantor has provided as evidence of financial responsibility to the owner or operator under this section. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit any other State or Federal statutory, contractual or common law liability of a guarantor to its owner or operator including, but not limited to, the liability of such guarantor for bad faith either in negotiating or in failing to negotiate the settlement of any claim. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to diminish the liability of any person under section 107 or 111 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 or other applicable law.

"(4) For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'guarantor' means any person, other than the owner or operator, who provides evidence of financial responsibility for an owner or operator under this subsection.

"(5)(A) The Administrator, in promulgating financial responsibility regulations under this section, may establish an amount of coverage for particular classes or categories of above ground storage tanks containing petroleum which shall satisfy such regulations and which shall not be less than $1,000,000 for each occurrence with an appropriate aggregate requirement.

"(B) The Administrator may set amounts lower than the amounts required by subparagraph (A) of this paragraph for above ground storage tanks containing petroleum which are at facilities not engaged in petroleum production, refining, or marketing and which are not used to handle substantial quantities of petroleum.

"(C) In establishing classes and categories for purposes of this paragraph, the Administrator may consider the following factors:

"(i) The size, type, location, storage, and handling capacity of above ground storage tanks in the class or category and the volume of petroleum handled by such tanks.

"(ii) The likelihood of release and the potential extent of damage from any release from above ground storage tanks in the class or category.

"(iii) The economic impact of the limits on the owners and operators of each such class or category, particularly relating to the small business segment of the petroleum marketing industry.

"(iv) The availability of methods of financial responsibility in amounts greater than the amount established by this paragraph.

"(v) Such other factors as the Administrator deems pertinent.

"(D) The Administrator may suspend enforcement of the financial responsibility requirements for a particular class or category of above ground storage tanks or in a particular State, if the Administrator makes a determination that methods of financial responsibility satisfying the requirements of this subsection are not generally available for above ground storage tanks in that class or category, and—

"(i) steps are being taken to form a risk retention group for such class of tanks; or

"(ii) such State is taking steps to establish a fund pursuant to section 9023(c)(1) of this Act to be submitted as evidence of financial responsibility.

A suspension by the Administrator pursuant to this paragraph shall extend for a period not to exceed 180 days. A determination to suspend may be made with respect to the same class or category or for the same State at the end of such period, but only if substantial progress has been made in establishing a risk retention group, or the owners or operators in the class or category demonstrate, and the Administrator finds, that the formation of such a group is not possible and that the State is unable or unwilling to establish such a fund pursuant to clause (ii).

"(e) NEW TANK PERFORMANCE STANDARDS.—The Administrator shall, not later than 3 months prior to the effective date specified in subsection (f), issue performance standards for above ground storage tanks brought into use on or after the effective date of such standards. The performance standards for new above ground storage tanks shall include, but need not be limited to, design, construction, installation, release detection, and compatibility standards.

"(f) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) Regulations issued pursuant to subsections (c) and (d) of this section, and standards issued pursuant to subsection (e) of this section, for above ground storage tanks containing regulated substances defined in section 9020(2)(B) (petroleum, including crude oil or any fraction thereof which is liquid at standard conditions of temperature and pressure) shall be effective not later than 30 months after the date of enactment of this subsection.

"(2) Standards issued pursuant to subsection (e) of this section (entitled 'New Tank Performance Standards') for above ground storage tanks containing regulated substances defined in section 9020(2)(A) shall be effective not later than 36 months after the date of enactment of this subsection.

"(3) Regulations issued pursuant to subsection (c) of this section (entitled 'Requirements') and standards issued pursuant to subsection (d) of this section (entitled 'Financial Responsibility') for above ground storage tanks containing regulated substances defined in section 9020(2)(A) shall be effective not later than 48 months after the date of enactment of this subsection.

"(g) INTERIM PROHIBITION.—Until the effective date of the standards promulgated by the Administrator under subsection (e) and after 180 days after the date of the enactment of this subsection, no person may install an above ground storage tank for the purpose of storing regulated substances unless such tank (whether of single or double wall construction)—

"(A) will prevent releases due to corrosion or structural failure for the operational life of the tank;

"(B) is cathodically protected against corrosion, constructed of noncorrosive material, steel clad with a noncorrosive material, or designed in a manner to prevent the release or threatened release of any store substance; and

"(C) the material used in the construction or lining of the tank is compatible with the substance to be stored.

"(h) EPA RESPONSE PROGRAM FOR PETROLEUM.—

"(1) BEFORE REGULATIONS.—Before the effective date of regulations under subsection (c), the Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7)) is authorized to—

"(A) require the owner or operator of an above ground storage tank to undertake corrective action with respect to any release of petroleum when the Administrator (or the State) determines that such corrective action will be done properly and promptly by the owner or operator of the above ground storage tank from which the release occurs; or

"(B) undertake corrective action with respect to any release of petroleum into the environment from an above ground storage tank if such action is necessary, in the judgment of the Administrator (or the State), to protect human health and the environment.

The corrective action undertaken or required under this paragraph shall be such as may be necessary to protect human health and the environment. Subject to the priority requirements of paragraph (3), the Administrator (or the State) shall give priority in undertaking such actions under subparagraph (B) to cases where the Administrator (or the State) cannot identify a solvent owner or operator of the tank who will undertake action properly.

"(2) AFTER REGULATIONS.—Following the effective date of regulations under subsection (c), all actions or orders of the Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7)) described in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be in conformity with such regulations. Following such effective date, the Administrator (or the State) may undertake corrective action with respect to any release of petroleum into the environment from an above ground storage tank only if such action is necessary, in the judgment of the Administrator (or the State), to protect human health and the environment and one or more of the following situations exists:

"(A) No person can be found, within 90 days or such shorter period as may be necessary to protect human health and the environment, who is—

"(i) an owner or operator of the tank, concerned,

"(ii) subject to such corrective action regulations, and

"(iii) capable of carrying out such corrective action properly.

"(B) A situation exists which requires prompt action by the Administrator (or the State) under this paragraph to protect human health and the environment.

"(C) The owner or operator of the tank has failed or refused to comply with an order of the Administrator under this subsection or section 9025 or with the order of a State under this subsection to comply with the corrective action regulations.

"(3) PRIORITY OF CORRECTIVE ACTIONS.—The Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7)) shall give priority in undertaking corrective actions under this subsection, and in issuing orders requiring owners or operators to undertake such actions, to releases of petroleum from above ground storage tanks which pose the greatest threat to human health and the environment.

"(4) CORRECTIVE ACTION ORDERS.—The Administrator is authorized to issue orders to the owner or operator of an above ground storage tank to carry out subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) or to carry out regulations issued under subsection (c)(4). A State acting pursuant to paragraph (7) of this subsection is authorized to carry out subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) only until the State's program is approved by the Administrator under section 9023 of this subtitle. Such orders shall be issued and enforced in the same manner and subject to the same requirements as orders under section 9025.

"(5) ALLOWABLE CORRECTIVE ACTIONS.—The corrective actions undertaken by the Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7)) under paragraph (1) or (2) may include temporary or permanent relocation of residents and alternative household water supplies. In connection with the performance of any corrective action under paragraph (1) or (2), the Administrator may undertake and exposure assessment as defined in paragraph (10) of this subsection or provide for such an assessment in a cooperative agreement with a State pursuant to paragraph (7) of this subsection. The costs of any such assessment may be treated as corrective action for purposes of paragraph (6), relating to cost recovery.

"(6) RECOVERY OF COSTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Whenever costs have been incurred by the Administrator, or by a State pursuant to paragraph (7), for undertaking corrective action or enforcement action with respect to the release of petroleum from an above ground storage tank, the owner or operator of such tank shall be liable to the Administrator or the State for such costs. The liability under this paragraph shall be construed to be the standard of liability which obtains under section 311 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

"(B) RECOVERY.—In determining the equities for seeking the recovery of costs under subparagraph (A), the Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7) of this subsection) may consider the amount of financial responsibility required to be maintained under subsections (c) and (d)(5) of this section and the factors considered in establishing such amount under subsection (d)(5).

"(C) EFFECT ON LIABILITY.—

"(i) NO TRANSFERS OF LIABILITY.—No indemnification, hold harmless, or similar agreement or conveyance shall be effective to transfer from the owner or operator of any above ground storage tank or from any person who may be liable for a release or threat of release under this subsection. Nothing in this subsection shall bar any agreement to insure, hold harmless, or indemnify a party to such agreement for any liability under this section.

"(ii) NO BAR TO CAUSE OF ACTION.—Nothing in this subsection, including the provisions of clause (i) of this subparagraph, shall bar a cause of action that an owner or operator or any other person subject to liability under this section, or a guarantor, has or would have, by reason of subrogation or otherwise against any person.

"(D) FACILITY.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'facility' means, with respect to any owner or operator, all above ground storage tanks used for the storage of petroleum which are owned or operated by such owner or operator and located on a single parcel of property (or on any contiguous or adjacent property).

"(7) STATE AUTHORITIES.—

"(A) GENERAL.—A State may exercise the authorities in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, subject to the terms and conditions of paragraphs (3), (5), (9), (10), and (11), and including the authorities of paragraphs (4), (6), and (8) of this subsection if—

"(i) the Administrator determines that the State has the capabilities to carry out effective corrective actions and enforcement activities; and

"(ii) the Administrator enters into a cooperative agreement with the State setting out the actions to be undertaken by the State.

"(B) COST SHARE.—Following the effective date of the regulations under subsection (c) of this section, the State shall pay 10 per centum of the cost of corrective actions undertaken either by the Administrator or by the State under a cooperative agreement, except that the Administrator may take corrective action at a facility where immediate action is necessary to respond to an imminent and substantial endangerment to human health or the environment if the State fails to pay the cost share.

"(8) EMERGENCY PROCUREMENT POWERS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator may authorize the use of such emergency procurement powers as he deems necessary.

"(9) DEFINITION OF OWNER.—As used in this subsection, the term 'owner' does not include any person who, without participating in the management of an above ground storage tank and otherwise not engaged in petroleum production, refining, and marketing, holds indicia of ownership primarily to protect the owner's security interest in the tank.

"(10) DEFINITION OF EXPOSURE ASSESSMENT.—As used in this subsection, the term 'exposure assessment' means an assessment to determine the extent of exposure of, or potential for exposure of, individuals to petroleum from a release from an above ground storage tank based on such factors as the nature and extent of contamination and the existence of or potential for pathways of human exposure (including ground or surface water contamination, air emissions, and food chain contamination), the size of the community within the likely pathways of exposure, and the comparison of expected human exposure levels to the short-term and long-term health effects associated with identified contaminants and any available recommended exposure or tolerance limits for such contaminants. Such assessment shall not delay corrective action to abate immediate hazards or reduce exposure.

"(11) FACILITIES WITHOUT FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY.—At any facility where the owner or operator has failed to maintain evidence of financial responsibility in amounts at least equal to the amounts established by subsection (d)(5)(A) of this section (or a lesser amount if such amount is applicable to such facility as a result of subsection (d)(5)(B) of this section) for whatever reason the Administrator shall use the authorities provided in subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) and paragraph (4) of this subsection and section 9025 of this subtitle to order corrective action to clean up such releases. States acting pursuant to paragraph (7) of this subsection shall use the authorities provided in subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) and paragraph (4) of this subsection to order corrective action to clean up such releases. Notwithstanding the provisions of this paragraph, the Administrator may use moneys from the fund to take the corrective actions authorized by paragraph (5) of this subsection to protect human health at such facilities and shall seek full recovery of the costs of all such actions pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (6)(A) of this subsection and without consideration of the factors in paragraph (6)(B) of this subsection. Nothing in this paragraph shall prevent the Administrator (or a State pursuant to paragraph (7) of this subsection) from taking corrective action at a facility where there is no solvent owner or operator or where immediate action is necessary to respond to an imminent and substantial endangerment of human health or the environment.

"APPROVAL OF STATE PROGRAMS

"SEC. 9023. (a) ELEMENTS OF STATE PROGRAM.—Beginning 30 months after the date of enactment of this section, any State may, submit an above ground storage tank release detection, prevention, and correction program for review and approval by the Administrator. The program may cover tanks used to store regulated substances referred to in 9020(2) (A) or (B) or both. A State program may be approved by the Administrator under this section only if the State demonstrates that the State program includes the following requirements and standards and provides for adequate enforcement of compliance with such requirements and standards—

"(1) requirements for maintaining a leak detection system, an inventory control system together with tank testing, or a comparable system or method designed to identify releases in a manner consistent with the protection of human health and the environment;

"(2) requirements for maintaining records of any monitoring or leak detection system or inventory control system or tank testing system;

"(3) requirements for reporting of any releases and corrective action taken in response to a release from an above ground storage tank;

"(4) requirements for taking corrective action in response to a release from an above ground storage tank;

"(5) requirements for the closure of tanks to prevent future releases of regulated substances into the environment;

"(6) requirements for maintaining evidence of financial responsibility for taking corrective action and compensating third parties for bodily injury and property damage caused by sudden and nonsudden accidental releases arising from operating an above ground storage tank;

"(7) standards of performance for new above ground storage tanks; and

"(8) requirements—

"(A) for notifying the appropriate State agency or department (or local agency or department) designated according to section 9021(b)(1) of the existence of any operational or nonoperational storage tank; and

"(B) for providing the information required on the form issued pursuant to section 9021(b)(2).

"(b) FEDERAL STANDARDS.—(1) A State program submitted under this section may be approved only if the requirements under paragraphs (1) through (7) of subsection (a) are no less stringent that the corresponding requirements standards promulgated by the Administrator pursuant to section 9022(a).

"(2)(A) A State program may be approved without regard to whether or not the requirements referred to in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (5) of subsection (a) are less stringent than the corresponding standards under section 9003(a) during the 1-year period commencing on the date of promulgation of regulations under section 9022(a) if State regulatory action but no State legislative action is required in order to adopt a State program.

"(B) If such State legislative action is required, the State program may be approved without regard to whether or not the requirements referred to in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (5) of subsection (a) are less stringent than the corresponding standards under section 9022(a) during the 2-year period commencing on the date of promulgation of regulations under section 9022(a) (and during an additional 1-year period after such legislative action is regulations are required to be promulgated by the State pursuant to such legislative action).

"(c) FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY.—(1) Corrective action and compensation programs administered by State or local agencies or departments may be submitted for approval under subsection (a)(6) as evidence of financial responsibility.

"(2) Financial responsibility required by this subsection may be established in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Administrator by any one, or any combination, of the following: insurance, guarantee, surety bond, letter of credit, qualification as a self-insurer or any other method satisfactory to the Administrator. In promulgating requirements under this subsection, the Administrator is authorized to specify policy or other contractual terms, including the amount of coverage required for various classes and categories of above ground storage tanks pursuant to paragraph (5) of this subsection, conditions, or defenses which are necessary or are unacceptable in establishing such evidence of financial responsibility in order to effectuate the purposes of this subtitle.

"(3) In any case where the owner or operator is in bankruptcy, reorganization, or arrangement, pursuant to the Federal Bankruptcy Code or where with reasonable diligence jurisdiction in any State court of the Federal courts cannot be obtained over an owner or operator likely to be solvent at the time of judgment, any claim arising from conduct for which evidence of financial responsibility must be provided under this subsection may be asserted directly against the guarantor providing such evidence of financial responsibility. In the case of any action pursuant to this paragraph such guarantor shall be entitled to invoke all rights and defenses which would have been available to the owner or operator if any action had been brought against the owner or operator by the claimant and which would have been available to the guarantor if an action had been brought against the guarantor by the owner or operator.

"(4) The total liability of any guarantor shall be limited to the aggregate amount which the guarantor has provided as evidence of financial responsibility to the owner or operator under this section. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit any other State or Federal statutory, contractual or common law liability of a guarantor to its owner or operator including, but not limited to, the liability of such guarantor for bad faith either in negotiating or in failing to negotiate the settlement of any claim. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to diminish the liability of any person under section 107 or 111 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 or other applicable law.

"(5) For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'guarantor' means any person, other than the owner or operator, who provides evidence of financial responsibility for an owner or operator under this subsection.

"(d) EPA DETERMINATION.—(1) Within 180 days of the date of receipt of a proposed State program, the Administrator shall, after notice and opportunity for public comment, make a determination whether the State's program complies with the provisions of this section and provides for adequate enforcement of compliance with the requirements and standards adopted pursuant to this section.

"(2) If the Administrator determines that a State program complies with the provisions of this section and provides for adequate enforcement of compliance with the requirements and standards adopted pursuant to this section, he shall approve the State program in lieu of the Federal program and the State shall have primary enforcement responsibility with respect to requirements of its program.

"(e) WITHDRAWAL OF AUTHORIZATION.—Whenever the Administrator determines after a public hearing that a State is not administering and enforcing a program authorized under this subtitle in accordance with the provisions of this section, he shall so notify the State. If appropriate action is not taken within a reasonable time, not to exceed 120 days after such notification, the Administrator shall withdraw approval of such program and reestablish the Federal program pursuant to this subtitle.

"INSPECTIONS, MONITORING, TESTING, AND CORRECTIVE ACTION

"SEC. 9024. (a) FURNISHING INFORMATION.—For the purposes of developing or assisting in the development of any regulation, conducting any study, taking any corrective action, or enforcing the provisions of this subtitle, any owner or operator of an above ground storage tank (or any tank subject to study under section 9028 that is used for storing regulated substances) shall, upon request of any officer, employee, or representative of the Environmental Protection Agency, duly designated by the Administrator, or upon request of any duly designated officer, employee, or representative of a State acting pursuant to subsection (h)(7) of section 9022, with an approved program, furnish information relating to such tanks, their associated equipment, their contents, conduct monitoring or testing, permit such officer at all reasonable times to have access to, and to copy, all records relating to such tanks, and to have access for corrective action. Neither the United States, nor any agent, employee, or officer thereof shall be immune or exempt from any process or sanction of any State or Federal court with respect to the enforcement of any such injunctive relief.

"(b) PRESIDENTIAL EXEMPTION.—The President may exempt any above ground storage tanks of any department, agency, or instrumentality in the Executive branch from compliance with such a requirement if he determines it to be in the paramount interest of the United States to do so. No such exemption shall be granted due to lack of appropriation unless the President shall have specifically requested such appropriation as a part of the budgetary process and the Congress shall have failed to make available such requested appropriations. Any exemption shall be for a period not in excess of 1 year, but additional exemptions may be granted for periods not to exceed 1 year upon the President's making a new determination. The President shall report each January to the Congress all exemptions from the requirements of this section granted during the preceding calendar year, together with his reason for granting each such exemption.

"STATE AUTHORITY

"SEC. 9027. Nothing in this subtitle shall preclude or deny any right of any State or political subdivision thereof to adopt or enforce any regulation, requirement or standard of performance respecting above ground storage tanks that is more stringent than a regulation requirement, or standard of performance in effect under this subtitle or to impose any additional liability with respect to the release of regulated substances within such State or political subdivision.

"(b) OTHER TANKS.—Not later than 36 months after the date of enactment of this section, the Administrator shall complete a study of all other above ground storage tanks.

"(c) ELEMENTS OF STUDIES.—The studies under subsections (a) and (b) shall include an assessment of the ages, types (including methods of manufacture, coatings, protection systems, the compatibility of the construction materials and the installation methods) and locations (including the climate of the locations) of such tanks; soil conditions, water tables, and the hydrogeology of tank locations; the relationship between the foregoing factors and the likelihood of releases from above ground storage tanks; the effectiveness and costs of inventory systems, tank testing, and leak detection systems; and such other factors as the Administrator deems appropriate.

"(d) FARM AND HEATING OIL TANKS.—Not later than 36 months after the date of enactment of this section, the Administrator shall conduct a study regarding the tanks referred to in section 9020(1) (A) and (B). Such study shall include estimates of the number and location of such tanks and an analysis of the extent to which there may be releases or threatened releases from such tanks into the environment.

"(e) REPORTS.—Upon completion of the studies authorized by this section, the Administrator shall submit reports to the President and to the Congress containing the results of the studies and recommendations respecting whether or not such tanks should be subject to the preceding provisions of this subtitle.

STORAGE TANK SAFETY ACT OF 1987

The emphasis of Senator Daschle's legislation is on the prevention, detection, and control of discharges of regulated substances stored in above-ground storage tanks.

While underground storage tanks are regulated under the Hazardous and Solid Waste Amendments of 1984 and the Superfund Reauthorization Act of 1986, aboveground storage tanks remain largely unregulated by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) or other agencies of the federal government.

Senator Daschle's bill proposes to amend the Hazardous and Solid Waste Act to require the EPA or a qualified state agency to establish mechanisms to prevent future leaks of above-ground storage tanks through the establishment of performance and design standards for new storage tanks and maintenance schedules for aging tanks. The bill also requires tank owners to equip tanks with monitoring devices to detect tank leaks before they reach the crisis stage. When spills do occur as a result of an above-ground tank failure, Senator Daschle's bill requires the Administrator of the EPA to require the responsible party to pay for a thorough clean-up of the discharged material and the relocation of the threatened population.

FACILITIES COVERED UNDER THE ACT

The Legislation covers all above-ground storage tanks except:

(1) Tanks holding a hazardous waste regulated under the RCRA hazardous waste program (Subtitle C);

(2) Farm and residential tanks holding less than 1,100 gallons of fuel and used for non-commercial purposes;

(3) Tanks storing heating oil for burning on the premises where stored;

(4) Septic tanks;

* * * * *

(6) Systems for collecting storm water and wastewater;

(7) Flow-through process tanks; and

(8) Liquid traps or associated gathering lines related to operations in the oil and natural gas industry.

NOTIFICATION

The notification program requires actions by distributors of regulated substances, sellers of tanks, and owners of tanks taken out of operation within the past ten years as well as owners of operational tanks.

These entities must report to the EPA as to the age, size, type, location, and uses of tanks.

NEW TANKS

The EPA will be required to develop and promulgate performance standards for new tanks, including but not limited to design, construction, installation, release detection, and compatibility.

REGULATORY PROGRAM

All tank owners will be required to have methods for detecting releases, keep records of their methods, report releases, take corrective action in response to releases and cooperate fully with EPA efforts to determine financial responsibility for a discharge.

INSPECTION AND ENFORCEMENT

Federal officials are authorized to request pertinent information from tank owners, inspect and sample tanks, and monitor and test tanks and surrounding soils, air, surface water, and ground water for contamination.

Federal officials are authorized to enforce the provisions of this legislation. The EPA may issue compliance orders for any violations of this legislation or regulations promulgated pursuant to this legislation. Offenders are subject to civil penalties of up to $10,000 per tank for each day of violation.

DISCHARGE RECOVERY

The Administrator of the EPA may take, or subcontract for, whatever immediate actions are necessary to protect human health in the event of a discharge of regulated materials from an above-ground storage tank. The owner or operator of a tank releasing regulated materials is responsible for the clean-up of the discharge under the oversight of the EPA. If the EPA is forced to conduct the clean-up themselves, it must do everything it can to determine the financially responsible party and recover the cost of the clean-up from those responsible parties.

STATE PROGRAMS

Senator Daschle's bill is designed to avoid duplicating the efforts of states that have established, or plan to establish, their own state regulatory programs for above-ground tanks. A state program, to be eligible, must be approved by the Administrator of the EPA. The Administrator must judge the program to be at least as stringent as the provisions of this legislation.

PRELIMINARY STUDY

Not later than one year after enactment, the Administrator is to recommend to Congress what types of tanks (taking into account such factors as age, type of use, type of construction, location, soil conditions, and hydrogeology) should be regulated and the extent of the regulation required for each class of tank.●

By Mr. MURKOWSKI (for himself and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 237. A bill to reform the Tongass Timber Supply Fund; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

TONGASS TIMBER REFORM ACT

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise today with the senior Senator from Alaska to introduce a bill to reform the timber program for the Tongass National Forest. Our bill repeals the direct appropriation contained in section 705(a) of ANILCA of at least $40 million annually for the Tongass Timber Program. This measure makes the timber program for the Tongass National Forest subject to the annual appropriations process as are all other national forests in the Nation.

In addition, Mr. President, our bill makes it clear that there is no statutorially mandated timber harvest level for the Tongass Forest. Each year the Forest Service may only prepare enough timber for sale to meet the demand of the local pulp and saw mills and the Forest Service may never provide for timber harvests which exceed the sustained yield capacity of the forest.

At the same time, Mr. President, our bill preserves the balance crafted in the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of designated wilderness and lands available for multiple use timber management. The creation of large wilderness areas in 1980, 5.5 million acres in the Tongass Forest, required intensive forest management, consisting of special siluicultural practices and Forest Service assistance in accessing more remote timber stands, to maintain the economic timber base at a level which would sustain jobs in southeast Alaska. Just as wilderness must be designated by Congress, this intensive management program is provided by statute.

A secure source of funds to carry out the intensive forest management program on the Tongass was viewed by Congress as a critical component of the wilderness compromise in 1980. This is why the $40 million direct appropriation was created. But 9 years of experience with the administration of the Tongass Timber Program and the current need to eliminate direct spending measures in an effort to meet our budget responsibilities necessitates the elimination of this budget appropriation.

During the national and international timber market depression of 1982 to 1986 the timber industry in Alaska suffered along with the timber industry nationally. But while less timber was demanded from the Tongass National Forest during this period, the amount of money expended on the Tongass Timber Program did not substantially decrease.

As we keep our eye on the deficit, we can not afford to proceed without annual congressional oversight of all Federal spending. Annual oversight is necessary to insure the most efficient use of taxpayer dollars by our Federal agencies. It is with these overriding concerns in mind that the senior Senator from Alaska and I propose to repeal the direct appropriation for the Tongass Timber Program.

Southeast Alaska is of a size equal to New England, or the New York to Washington corridor. Even today it is populated only by 70,000 people. In the 1950's, when pulp mill construction began in southeast Alaska, employment was based upon fishing which was seasonal. I know, because I grew up in that environment. For the communities, the coming of the pulp mills meant year-round employment, not only for those who worked at the pulp mills, but for those who worked in the woods.

The Forest Service, acting in effect as an economic development administration, solicited industry operators from the lower 48 to come to Alaska and purchase timber sales and build the pulp mills.

The long-term sales were competitively bid sales with companies all over the lower 48 offered the opportunity to bid. There was only one bidder for each of three sales because the risk of establishing an industry in Alaska was so great. One American firm agreed in 1951 to build the mill in Ketchikan. Another American firm agreed in 1956 to build a pulp mill in Wrangell. However, that sale was converted into a saw mill sale of 25 years duration after the company failed to build the required mill.

A Japanese firm obtained the Sitka sale. That agreement was put together through General MacArthur's headquarters, along with the Departments of State, Agriculture and Interior after the Forest Service first made sure that no American company wanted to purchase it. This was the very first Japanese industrial venture in the United States after the war.

Interestingly, in the case of this pulp mill, the Japanese are doing what we asked them to do. They employed their capital to build a plant in the United States and hired American workers who produce a value-added product for sale around the world. The two pulp mills have exported more that $3 billion in products since they were constructed.

In 1988 the total forest products exports from Alaska were valued at $475 million. This is up from $327 million in 1987 and $249 million in 1986. And our forest products do not only go to Japan, Alaska is making significant progress in tapping other markets in China, Korea, Taiwan, Thailand and Indonesia, Mexico, and India.

It is important to note that an integrated timber industry has been built in southeast Alaska. The saw mills are able to sell their pulp logs from the timber sales which they purchase as well as the chips which are byproducts of their manufacturing process. Similarly, the pulp mills have an outlet for their saw logs. An over mature forest like the Tongass contains timber 50 percent of which is suitable only for pulp, while the remaining 50 percent is suitable for sawing. Without the pulp mills the saw mills would have to leave on the ground or in the woods half of the wood they harvest.

The point of this history is to emphasize that the Forest Service plan was to exchange the timber for manufacturing facilities which would provide year-round employment in the two pulp mills; Ketchikan and Sitka are the only 2 year-round manufacturing plants in Alaska.

In 1988 the harvest increased from the 1986 level of 291 million board feet to 396 million board feet. And in 1988 over 4,300 people are employed in the timber industry in the Tongass Forest. The two pulp mills have been working three shifts 24 hours a day producing a product that is exported to 37 countries. The industry anticipates that in 1989, 450 million board feet will be harvested in the National Forest alone.

Make no mistake, Mr. President, no other industry in southeast Alaska can really replace the money and jobs brought into southeast Alaska by the timber industry.

In 1980 the Alaska national interest lands conservation act designated 5.5 million acres of the Tongass National Forest as wilderness. These wilderness areas include 1.7 million acres of commercial forest land. So much wilderness was set aside by ANILCA that the land base which remained open to logging was insufficient to provide the timber necessary to maintain the then existing 4,000 industry jobs in southeast Alaska.

In an effort to balance the desire for maximum wilderness and the need to maintain timber industry jobs, Congress included section 705 in ANILCA. Section 705 established an intensive management fund which was designed to ensure that the timber harvest from the Tongass would be sufficient to support 4,000 timber industry jobs.

Mr. President, I am aware that legislative proposals to designate additional wilderness lands in the Tongass National Forest and to terminate the contracts between the United States and the pulp mills are being circulated by the national preservation groups. These are simply attempts to shut down the timber industry in my State. They would destroy the 1980 compromise and would devastate the dependent communities in southeast Alaska.

Administration of the Tongass National Forest has been far from perfect. Problems have been identified with excesses in the expenditure of funds and the preparation of timber beyond what was demanded in the down market period. I believe that subjecting the timber program to the annual appropriations process will answer these problems without disturbing the delicate land use balance of multiple use and wilderness in the Tongass National Forest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487, as amended) is amended by striking Section 705(a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following subsection:

SEC. 705. (a) Subject to available appropriations, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to carry out a program of intensive management of the commercial forest land of the Tongass National Forest in order to assure the availability of a sufficient supply of timber to achieve an allowable sale quantity of 4.5 billion board feet per decade. For each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and offer for sale or release timber volumes on the Tongass National Forest based upon his estimate of the annual demand of the dependent industry and the sustained yield capacity of the forest. The Secretary of Agriculture shall base his annual estimate upon projections of future timber demand.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor a bill with my colleague from Alaska which we hope will put to rest a dispute which threatens the economy of a region of our State.

Management of Alaska's Tongass National Forest has repeatedly been a bone of contention during my career in the Senate. During the mid-seventies it was injected into the Alaska lands debate. The issue then was how much of the Tongass should be set aside in wilderness.

Alaskans saw the problem as how we were to overcome the economic costs of wilderness withdrawals. Timber harvesting was and is a mainstay of southeast Alaska's economy. We recognized that as the wilderness proposals increased in size, the amount of the forest remaining for multiple use—including timber harvesting—would shrink.

The wilderness proponents came forward with a compromise which was incorporated into the Alaska Lands Act in 1980. A third of the forest went into wilderness, and to make up for the lost timber base a permanent appropriation was established to guarantee funding for intensive management of the remainder of the forest. That settled the issue for little more than 5 years. But in that compromise was the source of the current dispute, which has been brewing now for nearly 4 years.

Timber markets slumped in the early eighties. Nationwide, the timber industry went through a devastating recession. Looking only at Alaska, this led to several related problems. Stumpage rates—the amount companies pay for logs harvested from the National Forests—dropped to a few dollars per thousand board feet. This happened because stumpage is calculated backward from the market value of the wood products, subtracting harvesting costs. As the value of wood products dropped, so did stumpage. Higher stumpage rates would have forced companies to either operate at a loss, or set their prices above the market rate—with a resulting loss of sales.

Even with low stumpage rates, the market became so poor that harvest rates in Alaska dropped to less than half their previous levels. The system did not respond to lower demand for timber in Alaska. The Forest Service was required to prepare timber for several years as if harvests had continued at their higher level.

By 1985, these combined factors put Alaska's timber industry at the bottom of a deep hole. Several mills were shut down, Federal timber receipts were low, and there was a large backlog of timber prepared but unsold, or sold but unharvested. Over the next few years, the seriousness of the problem became clear as statistics for this period were finalized.

The same groups which had called for wilderness in the Tongass in the 1970's seized on this snapshot of Alaska's timber industry and spent the last few years trying to convince us that it no longer made sense to harvest timber from the Tongass. Fortunately for the people of southeast Alaska, they were and are wrong.

After hitting rock bottom, the demand for Alaska timber began to improve after 1985. When the value of the yen began to climb, the markets shot up, and harvest rates began to improve. After several years of renewed growth, Alaska's timber industry has climbed out of the hole and appears headed for steady ground.

Now, what about that grim picture painted in 1985? Mills have reopened and industry employment has climbed steadily for the last few years. Stumpage rates have increased, and will continue to do so as the market price for Alaskan wood products improves. This means Federal receipts are increasing.

As for the backlog of timber prepared by the Forest Service, it has been effectively eliminated. Based on projected harvest levels, most of Alaska's mills have less than 2 years supply under contract and available for harvest. This is right on target—the Forest Service tries to maintain 2 to 3 years supply under contract. And on the Tongass the volume prepared but unsold is now minimal.

The timber supply on the Tongass was brought back in line through work done by the Appropriations Committee. Each of the last 2 years, we determined the amount of new timber volume which should be prepared after a careful review of the volume outstanding and of the projected harvest. This has not been a pleasant process, primarily because we have had to parry rhetorical attacks on the timber program itself at the same time.

There remains strong sentiment—particularly in the House—that something should be done to change the Tongass Timber Program. At the heart of the complaints I have heard has been a dissatisfaction with the existing permanent appropriation. Some believe that it is a subsidy for Alaska's timber industry which is not justified in these austere economic times. They are wrong to characterize it in this way. If anything is subsidized by the fund it is the 1980 wilderness withdrawals.

However, I recognize that this fund may have outlived its usefulness. It has been used by those who object to timber harvesting to twist perceptions of the Tongass Timber Program. It has become the focus of controversy, and it does not provide enough benefits to offset these negatives. And finally, returning the Tongass to annual appropriations will remove a barrier to oversight needed to assure that the Forest Service's timber preparation does not again lose sight of timber demand.

By Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. BOSCHWITZ):

S. 238. A bill to amend the Arms Export Control Act to impose sanctions against firms involved in the transfer of chemical and biological agents or their related production equipment or technical assistance to Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Libya, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE PREVENTION ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Chemical and Biological Warfare Prevention Act of 1989. The aim of the bill is aptly described by the title: with the passage of this legislation, I hope to prevent the mass murders which take place on an unprecedented scale when poison gas and biological weapons are used.

The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations, Mr. PELL, first brought this issue of chemical weapons proliferation to the attention of the Senate last summer. At that time, I was proud to cosponsor his legislation placing sanctions on Iraq for its use of chemical weapons against its own citizens. Although our legislation passed the Senate three times, difficulties with the House of Representatives and the State Department prevented its enactment.

The problem posed by the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons is grave and the situation grim. With the critical assistance of Western industrial firms, four of the most radical regimes in the world are acquiring weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them.

The world's press has discovered an international conspiracy of supposedly legitimate industrial concerns that has been profiting handsomely by providing the capability to produce chemical and biological weapons to some of the most irrational, unstable, and anti-Western regimes in the world: Libya, Syria, Iran, and Iraq.

According to newspaper articles and TV reports, the conspiracy involves chemical companies, major electrical firms, construction and engineering firms, major banks, transportation agents, and various suppliers—all of them foreign.

Some of the names that are rolling out of the press reports are small- and medium-sized firms, but others are well-known foreign multinationals including Siemans, the German electrical giant, and Deutsche Bank, one of the biggest banks in the world. If the rumors flooding Washington are any indication, other large firms may well have serious exposure.

The most serious implications of this scandal are the allegations of involvement by government officials of one of our closest allies, the Federal Republic of Germany. According to today's issue of Der Stern, Colonel Qadhafi's poison gas plant was actually designed by a German state-owned engineering firm and the purpose of this plant was an "open secret." Just this morning, the German Press Agency reported that the German Foreign Affairs Committee had been informed of the involvement of a second German Government-owned firm.

Further, the involvement of German firms in poison gas production in the Middle East was revealed in a front page New York Times story on March 30, 1984, almost 5 years ago. For 10 years, Foreign Minister Genscher's party has controlled the West German Economics and Foreign Ministries. If he now says that he did not know what was going on, it is because he did not want to know.

Mr. President, my legislation would amend the Arms Export Control Act to place sanctions on suppliers of materials and technology for the production of chemical and biological warfare agents by Third World nations. Sanctions would also be placed on those who provide the means to deliver such weapons.

The bill directs the President to prepare a list of controlled materials and technology. Sanctions are triggered on firms which export from this list to Iran, Iraq, Syria, Libya, or any other country which has used chemical or biological weapons in the past 5 years. There is clinical data to suggest that Cuban forces in Angola have used chemical weapons during this period as well as evidence that chemical weapons are being stockpiled in Angola for use against Jonas Savimbi's UNITA forces.

I am also pleased to join as a cosponsor of the Chemical and Biological Weapons Control Act of 1989 which is being introduced today by Mr. PELL. This bill would place sanctions on countries which violate international law and use these weapons on their neighbors or even their own citizens.

Up to now, there has been no international penalty for countries to violate the 1925 Geneval Protocol on Chemical and Biological Weapons. With the passage of Senator PELL's legislation there will be such a penalty.

Mr. President, I believe that both approaches, sanctions on suppliers and sanctions on users, are not in conflict. Rather, they are complementary. The Congress will examine both proposals and will see that both are needed if we are to control the proliferation and use of these weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of firms named by the press as participating in the chemical weapons trade be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, along with the text of the legislation I am introducing today.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 238

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Chemical and Biological Warfare Prevention Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade recognizes that national security concerns may serve as a legitimate basis for constricting free and open trade; title XXI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade states that "nothing in this Agreement shall be construed . . . to prevent any contracting party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests . . .";

(2) the essential security interests of the United States require an immediate end to all trade in chemical and biological weapons, and transfers of technology and delivery systems for chemical and biological weapons, to certain destinations;

(3) four countries of the Middle East, Iran, Iraq, Libya, and Syria, either support terrorism as a national policy or have done so in the recent past;

(4) Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Libya are either producing chemical weapons or on the verge of doing so;

(5) chemical weapons have been used by Iraq against its own citizens;

(6) chemical weapons represent a grave new threat to friendly countries of the Middle East and ultimately the United States itself;

(7) Free World industrial firms have been instrumental in the development of chemical weapons in these and other countries;

(8) any efforts by Communist-bloc countries to aid and abet the production or use of chemical or biological weapons, or to develop and deploy delivery systems for such weapons, by Iraq, Libya, or any other nation of the Middle East/Persian Gulf region are deplorable;

(9) international cooperation has so far been unable to stem the trade in chemical and biological weapons and their industrial inputs; and

(10) in order to inhibit the trade in chemical and biological weapons and their industrial inputs, severe sanctions must be applied to individuals and firms which export prohibited items and technology to proscribed destinations.

SEC. 3. POLICY.

It should be the policy of the United States to take all appropriate measures—

(1) to discourage the proliferation of the material and technology necessary and intended to produce or deliver chemical weapons;

(2) to discourage all states from acquiring such material and technology;

(3) to discourage Communist-bloc countries from aiding and abetting other countries from acquiring such material and technology; and

(4) to discourage private companies in non-Communist countries from aiding and abetting other nations from acquiring such material and technology.

SEC. 4. AMENDMENT TO THE ARMS EXPORT CONTROL ACT.

The Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 7—SANCTIONS AGAINST FIRMS TRANSFERRING CHEMICAL WEAPONS TO TERRORIST COUNTRIES

SEC. 71. PROHIBITION ON CERTAIN EXPORTS.

"(a) PROHIBITION.—(1)(A) No item on the list prepared by the President under paragraph (2) which is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or which is exported by a person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may be exported to a country described in subsection (b).

"(B) Subparagraph (A) does not apply to any export pursuant to a contract entered into before the date of enactment of this section.

"(2) The President shall prepare a list of chemical and biological agents, production equipment, and technical assistance the export of which would materially assist a country in attaining a chemical or biological warfare capability or systems for the delivery of chemical or biological weapons.

"(b) DESTINATIONS OF EXPORTS.—The countries referred to in subsection (a) and section 73(a)(1) are Iran, Iraq, Libya, Syria or any country which has used chemical or biological weapons in the past five years or use such weapons after date of enactment of this Act, except that any of these countries shall be excluded, for purposes of applying such provisions, beginning 30 days after the President requests such exclusion by submitting the name of such country to the Congress.

"SEC. 72. REPORT.

"(a) Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this section, and every 90 days thereafter, the President shall submit to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a report on efforts by Iran, Iraq, Libya, Syria, and any country which has, during the five years prior to the report used chemical or biological weapons, to acquire the material and technology to produce and deliver chemical weapons, together with an assessment of such countries' present and future capability to produce and deliver such weapons.

"(b) Such report shall also include an assessment of whether and to what degree Communist-bloc countries have aided and abetted the government any country reported upon pursuant to subsection (a) in its effort to acquire the material and technology described in subsection (a).

"(c) Such report shall further list—

"(1) those companies in non-Communist countries which in the past have aided and abetted the government of any country reported on pursuant to subsection (a) in that effort; and

"(2) those companies in non-Communist countries which continue to aid and abet the government of any country reported on pursuant to subsection (a), in that effort, as of the date of the report.

"(d) Such report shall provide any confirmed or credible intelligence or other information that any non-Communist country has aided and abetted the government of any country reported on pursuant to subsection (a) in that effort, either directly or by facilitating the activities of the companies listed in paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (c) or had knowledge of the activities of the companies listed in paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (c), but took no action to halt or discourage such activities.

"(e) Nothing in the section requires the disclosure of information in violation of Senate Resolution 400 of the Ninety-fourth Congress or otherwise alters, modifies or supersedes any of the authorities contained therein.

"SEC. 73. MANDATORY SANCTIONS FOR FUTURE VIOLATIONS.

"(a) DETERMINATION BY THE PRESIDENT.—The President, subject to subsection (c), shall apply sanctions under subsection (b) for a period of 3 years, if the President determines that, on or after the date of enactment of this section, a United States or foreign person has exported any item in violation of section 71(a).

"(b) SANCTIONS.—The sanctions referred to in subsection (a) shall apply to any person committing the violation, as well as to any parent, affiliate, subsidiary, and successor entity of the person, and, except as provided in subsection (c), are as follows:

"(1) a prohibition on contracting with, and procurement of products and services from, a sanctioned person, by any department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States Government,

"(2) a prohibition on importation into the United States of all products produced by a sanctioned person, and

"(3) a suspension of partent rights, as described in section 75.

"(c) EXCEPTIONS.—The President shall not apply sanctions under this section—

"(1) in the case of procurement of defense articles or defense services—

"(A) under existing contracts or subcontracts, including the exercise of options for production quantities to satisfy United States opereational military requirements;

"(B) if the President determines that the person or other entity to which the sanctions would otherwise be applied is a sole source supplier of essential defense articles or services and no alternative supplier can be identified; or

"(C) if the President determines that such articles or services are essential to the national security under defense coproduction agreements; or

"(2) to—

"(A) products or services provided under contracts entered into before the date on which the President notifies the Congress of the intention to impose the sanctions;

"(B) spare parts;

"(C) component parts, but not finished products, essential to United States products or production;

"(D) routine servicing and maintenance of products; or

"(E) information and technology.

"(d) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'component part' means any article which is not usable for its intended functions without being imbedded in or integrated into any other product and which, if used in production of a finished product, would be substantially transformed in that process;

"(2) the term 'finished product' means any article which is usable for its intended functions without being imbedded or integrated into any other product, but in no case shall such term be deemed to include an article produced by a person other than a sanctioned person that contains parts or components of the sanctioned person if the parts or components have been substantially transformed during production of the finished product; and

"(3) the term 'sanctioned person' means a person, and any parent, affiliate, subsidiary, or successor entity of the person, upon whom sanctions have been imposed under this section.

"SEC. 74. PENALTIES.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Whoever knowingly violates or conspires to or attempts to violate section 71(a) shall be fined nor more than five times the value of the exports involved or $50,000 whichever is greater, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Such certificate shall be recorded in the official file of the patent and shall be considered as part of the original patent. The Commissioner shall publish in the Official Gazette of the Patent and Trademark Office a notice of such suspension.".

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 239. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to waive the late enrollment penalty under Medicare part B for any disabled individual who was covered under his own or his spouse's private employment-related health insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

WAIVER OF ENROLLMENT PENALTY FOR DISABLED SPOUSES

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing, a bill which will eliminate an inequity which exists in the Medicare Program for Social Security disability insurance [SSDI] beneficiaries. I first introduced a similar bill in the 99th Congress, S. 1604, as well as S. 176 in the 100th Congress, designed to accomplish the same objective. There is a small number of SSDI beneficiaries who are eligible for Medicare but who have failed to enroll because they have health coverage through the extension of their work related health insurance or a spouse's employment related health care plan. If these individuals ever need to enroll in the Medicare part B program, they will be subjected to a 10-percent annual penalty for their delayed enrollment. This bill will address this persistent inequity.

Mr. President, as you know Medicare is a program first enacted in 1965 as title VIII of the Social Security Act to provide financial access to vital health care services to our elderly population. In 1973, Medicare coverage was extended to disabled individuals entitled to Social Security disability insurance for 24 months or more. Since its inception, the program has experienced an enormous growth. In 1987, it is estimated that 28 million elderly and 3 million disabled individuals will receive benefits in the Medicare Program. It is estimated that Medicare expenditures will reach $83.9 billion. It is clear that this program is serving a vital source of access for our seniors and disabled individuals.

When Medicare was first enacted in 1965, a 10-percent annual surcharge was assessed against those who delayed their enrollment in the voluntary part B—supplemental medical insurance—of Medicare. This provision was enacted to create a disincentive for individuals who were planning to delay enrollment until they became ill and in need of health care services. This was a provision based on sound actuarial accounting and was designed to assure a sufficient amount of premiums to assist in the funding of the program. At that time, there was a maximum of a 30-percent penalty because the enrollment period for the part B of Medicare was limited to 3 years. In 1972, the limited enrollment period was abolished. However, Congress failed to repeal or cap the part B surcharge. We now have a small population of individuals who have incurred a substantial penalty for their late enrollment.

According to the Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA], in 1983, 169 seniors were paying a 150-percent penalty and 18 seniors were paying a 160-percent penalty. This penalty is an add-on to their monthly premium payment. There are situations where this surcharge is not only unfair and inequitable but is penalizing American citizens who are actually saving the Federal Government significant Medicare outlays.

Congress recently addressed this problem and rectified a similar circumstance where old age and survivors beneficiaries were being inappropriately penalized. Included in Public Law 97-248, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 [TEFRA] was the "Working Aged" provisions which made Medicare the "Secondary Payer" for certain elderly workers. The provisions amended the Federal Age Discrimination Employment Act [ADEA] to require employers to offer their employees aged 65 to 69 and their dependents the equivalent health care coverage as their younger employees. It became clear that it would be inappropriate to penalize these individuals and subject them to the part B premium surcharge if enrollment in the part B program would simply duplicate their work-based health care coverage. This inequity was rectified with the passage of Public Law 98-369, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 [DEFRA] which exempted these individuals from the surcharge.

The bill I am introducing today would address another circumstance where individuals are being inappropriately penalized. A small number of disabled individuals who are qualified for Medicare as a result of their eligibility for SSDI, receive their health care coverage through a spouse's employment related health care plan or through the continuation of their own work-related health plan. They are saving the Federal Government health care dollars by their utilization of an employment related plan to cover the expenses of their disability and health care needs and they should not be penalized for their efforts. This bill will eliminate the part B premium penalty for the disabled person and/or disabled spouse who are enrolled in a group health care plan provided by the beneficiary's former employment or a spouse's current or former employment.

I urge all my colleagues to support this piece of legislation and help to eliminate this inequitable and unfair situation. We must persist in our efforts of making Medicare affordable, accessible and fair in its design and implementation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 239

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to premiums for months beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 240. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 to modify the calculation of Federal deficits and maximum deficit amounts under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 and to modify the maximum deficit amounts set by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CALCULATION OF FEDERAL DEFICIT

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which I first proposed late in the 100th Congress which would remove by increments the Social Security trust fund surpluses used in our calculations of the yearly deficit. I am pleased that the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Senator MOYNIHAN] is joining me in this effort.

Mr. President, we are introducing this legislation because of our concern about the ever-growing mountain of national debt. Our current practice of hiding behind the Social Security surpluses when calculating the yearly deficits is allowing those deficits to add up, year by year, to be an enormous national debt that threatens the economic future of our country. The alternative that we propose today will not only end the practice of lending and spending—spending today in the hope of paying it back tomorrow—but will allow us over the next 15 years or so to actually eliminate all—all—I repeat, all—of the Federal Government's publicly held debt that is outstanding today. This is, I realize, a remarkable and, to some, a perhaps fanciful assertion yet, I believe I can demonstrate to the most profound skeptics that what I say is accurate but that it is also politically achievable.

Mr. President let me begin with some brief history. Since 1983, when we changed the Social Security Program to make sure that reserves would be put aside for future retirees, Social Security surpluses have been steadily accumulating—at first very slowly, and now in quite significant amounts. In fact, they are now accumulating in the Social Security trust fund at the rate of over $109 million per day.

As we know, these surpluses are not real cash; they represent nothing more than the Social Security Administration's authority to pay out retirement benefits. Nevertheless, since 1983 these surpluses have been used in our budget deficit calculations from year to year—deficits which in turn have contributed to a ballooning national debt. It shouldn't take a wizard of economics to tell us that this simply does not bode well for today's workers who will be tomorrow's retirees.

It is not terribly useful to argue over how much of the Social Security surpluses are simply notes indicating interest owed to the fund and how much of the surpluses are really cash surpluses. Rather we must concentrate on how the numbers themselves have allowed us to ignore the Nation's true deficit year after year—and ignore those deficits' contribution to the Nation's debt.

At the present time, the Social Security trust fund [SSTF] masks the country's real deficit, an additional $39 billion in fiscal year 1988 alone for an actual deficit total of $194 billion. In fiscal year 1989, the G-R-H maximum deficit target is $136, but the [CBO] project SSTF surplus of $56 billion will hide the actual deficit of $192 billion. This distortion will grow more and more pronounced with each passing year.

By the end of 1993, I believe there will be a massive and entrenched structural deficit that will have far-reaching implications for our national economy for the rest of this century and well into the next.

At the end of 1993, when Gramm-Rudman-Hollings finally runs its course, the deficit is supposed to be zero. What we will find, however, is that the real deficit will be a startling $103 billion, an amount, of course, that is identical to that year's projected surplus in the Social Security trust fund. Those will be tough dollars to cut out of Government programs all at one time.

If Congress continues to count Social Security surpluses as deficit reduction and continues to borrow and expend excess Social Security revenues on non-Social Security programs, we will simply add that additional and growing debt which will be owed by the U.S. Treasury to the Social Security system and the retirees which depend upon it, on top of the existing national debt.

Mr. President, we are talking about some very big numbers. The United States' national debt currently stands at about $2.6 trillion. In this decade alone, with 1 year yet to go, we have added over $1.5 trillion in new Federal debt, from $794 billion at the end of fiscal year 1981 to the current $2.6 trillion, a jump of some 156 percent in 7 years—and we did it without war or another great depression. And we had to borrow so much from overseas that we're now in danger of losing our economic independence.

Moreover, we should not forget the interest that we have to pay on that national debt every year. For example, the interest the Treasury paid on the $2.6 trillion national debt in fiscal year 1988 was almost the exact amount of the deficit that year—$152 billion—representing an incredible 28 percent of all the general and other non-Social Security reserves collected by the U.S. Treasury that year.

If we continue to permit the national debt to accumulate by the process I have just described, our annual interest payments will more than double—from $152 to $375 billion—in just a decade. By the year 2000, depending on economic assumptions, as much as 60 percent of all non-Social Security revenues would be required to make interest payments alone.

Mr. President, perhaps some comparisons will be enlightening. That $152 billion that we paid in interest in fiscal year 1988 was more than double the total of all Federal spending on programs for the poor—welfare, Medicaid, housing, food stamps. In fact, that $152 billion spent in interest on the national debt in 1988 alone was more than the Federal Government spent for farm aid, housing, education, unemployment compensation, veterans' benefits, the post office, and highways—combined. That $152 billion was, in fact, more than seven times greater than all the Federal subsidies for education.

The last time interest payments took such a large part of the budget was in 1948, when the Government was paying the debt service incurred to fight and win World War II.

Taking this discussion one step further, we should note that the $152 billion spent just to remain current on the interest on the national debt in 1988 was money that had to be paid to investors, 10 to 15 percent of it to investors abroad, and therefore could not be used for anything else. Those dollars used to pay out interest debt do not go to poor people, to struggling students, or to research cancer or Alzheimer's disease. Rather, the individuals who get the interest payments are the most affluent—investors, bankers, financiers. Failure to change our ways can only mean that government will become the agent to tax the many to make huge interest payments to the few—clearly, we must not allow this to happen.

I ask you, my colleagues, to weigh the consequences of again doubling the national debt and its interest in the next decade. If we have even a small surge in inflation, it could go much, much higher. Obviously, the way we are going ensures that people who need help will get less help, and those who are already well off will get a guaranteed income.

On the other hand, as we buy in the publicly held portion of the national debt, which is currently most of it, interest rates will surely go down. This means that every American will have reduced housing costs, more small businesses have a chance to get off the ground, and more people will be employed. As we eliminate the national debt and the interest owed on that debt, as we indeed bite the economic bullet sooner rather than later, we have to give ourselves the chance to rebuild the Nation's economic engine that drives the American dream. All of this is an opportunity we can seize today. We should and must.

Mr. President, the only way to do it is to get Social Security out of the budget and look at the deficit for what it really is, without the shadows and mirrors now provided by the Social Security surpluses. We need the will to be responsible and make responsible choices now—not 3 or 4 years from now when the problem may be too big and too daunting.

Every day we postpone removing the trust fund off budget simply compounds the pain. As the surplus spirals, the task will become more intimidating.

For that reason I am introducing legislation to take the last step in removing Social Security from the Federal budget and to disclose early on the true state of the Federal budget. The measure I am proposing attempts to do four things: First, leave the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings' targets in place; second, freeze the Social Security surplus at its projected level in fiscal year 1989—$56 billion—which can be counted against the deficit through fiscal year 1993; third, remove the Social Security trust fund from the "deficit counting game" by revealing the $56 billion additional deficit at the end of fiscal year 1993; and fourth, extend the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings' law 2 years to eliminate the $56 billion actual deficit altogether.

Mr. President, let us agree that in future years, we will not use more Social Security surpluses than the projected $56 billion Social Security surplus in fiscal year 1989 to calculate the national deficit. Freezing the use of Social Security surpluses to offset the deficit will force us to look at a more accurate representation of that year's deficit—and take appropriate action by either cutting Government spending or raising additional revenues. If we take such action in increments, the pain of taking such action later should be reduced, and we will not risk future Congresses succumbing to the temptation of using the Social Security surpluses to finance a continuing spending spree.

In 1983 we revised the Social Security Program to make sure that there would be a surplus reserve. Today's workers—euphemistically called the baby boomers—will be retiring at a time when there will be fewer workers to support them. We must make sure that the revenues that have been building up for these future retirees are protected for their use. They will not be there if they have been loaned out to a government that is already hopelessly overextended.

We cannot pretend that the money in the Social Security trust fund is reducing the deficit today while also pretending that it is available, with interest, to fund baby boomers' retirements in the next century. Huge tax increases or benefit reductions will be needed when it is time to take the money out of this alleged trust fund.

What I am suggesting today makes fiscal sense. I urge my colleagues to join me in meeting these realistic budgetary goals during the next few years to ensure prosperity down the road. I urge my colleagues' support for a proposal which will reduce public spending in a planned, thoughtful manner over the next few years rather than risk either an entrenched structural deficit or abrupt cuts which promise to be even more difficult to make. I urge my colleagues' support for a plan that would ensure future retiree benefits as well as a reduction in the national debt, thus assuring our country's overall economic strength. It won't be easy, but it must be done.

The legislation I am proposing, along with Senator MOYNIHAN, the senior Senator from New York, will allow this country to buy in all U.S. Treasury obligations held by corporations, institutions, and increasingly foreign investors—in other words, eliminate the entire publicly held national debt.

Mr. President, that is an extraordinary claim. Obviously, if we can achieve it, it is well worth achieving, because we would drive down interest rates, we would make capital more available, and housing would become more affordable. There is only one simple thing we have to do to realize what to many must seem a visionary fiscal miracle, and that is to stop as soon as we possibly can the current practice of spending the annual Social Security surpluses as if somehow they really reduced the deficit.

Mr. President, I am deeply concerned that we are on a lending and spending binge, where those annual surpluses now running at $50 billion a year, will go up to hundreds of billions of dollars a year by the end of this next decade. I am concerned that that money, as we are now doing with it, is going to be spent as if it was revenues to the general fund when in fact it is revenues that are supposed to be put aside to secure that retirement of the people who are now working, many of them in the baby-boom generation.

My legislation will put a halt to that practice, and then eliminate what we are now doing over a few years. I think it is in our interests to do so, not only so that we can keep the promises we have made to the retirees of the future, but unless we do take this course and go down this road, we are going to see a sorry spectacle. We are going to see the Congress and the White House report that our deficit, by the year 1993, has shrunk to zero. And yet we will continue to see our national debt grow exponentially. By the year 2000 it will not be $2.5 trillion, which is what it is today; it will be $5 trillion.

With that debt burden will come an increasing debt service burden, in the form of interest payments on the national debt. They will run this coming fiscal year, fiscal 1990, around $182 billion. About 28 cents of every tax dollar that the Treasury will receive from all sources save Social Security will go to pay in fiscal 1990 only interest on the national debt.

If we double our national debt from $2.5 trillion to $5 trillion, I think we all realize that far more than 28 cents out of every dollar to the general fund will go to pay interest on our debt.

Mr. President, the only way to keep the American job machine running is to get Social Security out of the budget. That is our opportunity today with this legislation. I urge my colleagues to give it careful study and consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 241. A bill to restore the right of voluntary prayer in public schools and to promote the separation of powers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am today reintroducing a bill to restore to our children their fundamental right to pray in school if and when they desire without interference or prohibition by school officials and the Federal courts. The language of this bill is identical to bills I introduced during the 98th, 99th, and 100th Congresses. It is my interest to continue to press this matter until the foolish decision by the Supreme Court is reversed.

Mr. President, during the Presidential campaign we heard a great deal from all the candidates—liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans—about the importance of traditional values. Obviously, it has finally dawned on the politicians what the American people have been saying for quite some time: Regardless of how many Federal programs you create, you can never solve a fundamentally moral problem by ignoring morality.

Consider, Mr. President, the havoc wrought as a result of abortion, pornography, incest, illegitimacy, poverty, teenage suicide, or AIDS—to name just a few. All have a common thread: A massive breakdown of America's moral fiber.

The vast majority of Americans understand that this collapse is a predictable result of discarding moral principles that deserve to survive—which, indeed, must survive if our Nation is to survive. The American people also understand that the abandonment of principles and values was in large part due to a series of decisions by unelected, elitist liberals on the Supreme Court who, in 1962, outlawed prayer in public schools.

Mr. President, their decisions not only deny America's spiritual heritage, they forsake the Constitution itself, supplanting in its stead constitutional interpretations solely supported by the Supreme Court's selective revision of American history. Instead of engendering an official attitude of neutrality toward religion in the schools as the public was led to believe they would, those decisions have in fact fueled the flames of Government intolerance of Christianity in the public schools.

How far have these decisions have taken us? Just let me cite a few examples. In the State of Florida, a school principal felt personally compelled by the Supreme Court's decisions to remove pictures of the Bible club from the high school annual with his scissors.

A teacher in North Carolina was similarly prohibited from reading her Bible during her lunch hour.

Students have been prohibited from praying in their cars and even from carrying their personal Bibles on school premises.

Three separate studies, Mr. President, have noted that textbooks in the public schools systematically shun the role of religion in molding the Nation and motivating our leaders because publishers believe Supreme Court decisions require such censorship.

Mr. President, such incidents contradict Supreme Court assurances in 1962 when it outlawed school prayer, in Abington School District against Schemp, that:

> The state may not establish a "religion of secularism" in the sense of affirmatively opposing or showing hostility to a religion, thus preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do.

However, Mr. President, Justice Stewart correctly foresaw that such intolerance of religion would—on the contrary—be the natural and precise effect of the Court's decision to ban school prayer. Dissenting from the majority, he declared that:

> A compulsory state educational system so structures a child's life that if religious exercises are held to be an impermissible activity in schools, religion is placed at an artificial and state-created disadvantage. Viewed in this light, permission of such exercises for those who want them is necessary if the schools are truly to be neutral in the matter of religion. And a refusal to permit religious exercises thus is seen, not as the realization of state neutrality, but rather as the establishment of a religion of secularism.

Mr. President, barring God from our classrooms was not the intent of our Founding Fathers who wrote the U.S. Constitution. Their sole intent was to prohibit the establishment of a national church; all remaining issues concerning church-state relations were left strictly with the States.

A mere 15 years before banning school prayer, Mr. President, the Nation's highest Court itself stated that:

> A manifestation of (governmental) hostility to (religion or religious teachings) would be at war with our national tradition as embodied in the First Amendment's guaranty of the free exercise of religion.

Mr. President, the problem in the matter of school prayer, as in so many areas of constitutional law, is that in the last two and a half decades activist Federal judges, with lifetime appointments and no accountability, elitists posing as egalitarians, have overstepped their bounds under the Constitution and usurped the power of Congress and the States, imposing their own personal views of good public policy on the American public, irrespective of the Constitution. Congress and the States no longer make the Nation's policy decisions. They do not do it on abortion, on busing, on prayer, on a whole host of other things.

Mr. President, we as a people are willing to trust the deliberative legislative process to set fundamental national policies. We do not want elitists doing it from behind the Federal bench with no accountability to the people.

Mr. President, potential encroachment by the Supreme Court is precisely why the Constitution's drafters enabled Congress to limit the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in article III, which states in section 2 that:

> In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Our Founding Fathers would not have granted Congress such authority, Mr. President, unless they intended Congress to exercise it when necessary.

Mr. President, I believe most Americans agree that the time is long overdue for Congress to use it constitutional authority to restore voluntary prayer to the public schools of America. My bill would do that by exercising Congress' clear prerogative under article III of the Constitution to remove from the Federal courts the jurisdiction over cases involving voluntary school prayer, Bible reading, or religious meetings in schools.

Under my bill, Mr. President, State courts would be free to continue strict adherence to the Supreme Court's restraints on the free exercise of religion. Indeed, the State courts could even choose to extend the Supreme Court's rationale and thus prohibit public school students from praying outside as well as inside the classroom. However, I believe many States' courts, instead, will uphold the constitutionality of prayer in schools.

Would that result be such a terrible thing, Mr. President? We are talking about Supreme Court decisions which would be—in the judgment of the elected representatives of the people and the President—so erroneous as to constitute usurpations of power from the other two branches of Government by the Supreme Court. As constitutional scholar Charles Black observes, "the rock on which rests the legitimacy of the judicial work in our democracy" is Congress' power over the jurisdiction of Federal courts, including the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, it would be a healthy corrective of the Supreme Court's erroneous religion decisions for the people to trust for a time in the State courts once again—the courts in which the Constitution's framers primarily placed their trust—and thus protect ourselves from further excesses in this area by the Supreme Court. In the process, the Supreme Court might learn a salutary lesson that it should avoid future excursions beyond its proper constitutional bounds—and cease rewriting the Constitution under the guise of interpreting it.

Finally, Mr. President, because a statute rather than a constitutional amendment is involved, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the lower Federal courts could be readily restored should the need for it become apparent. My legislation would simply ensure that for as long as necessary, the Supreme Court would receive no opportunity to further extend its errors on the subject of school prayer.

Mr. President, this legislation would effectively replace the nonsense of Federal judges on school prayer over the past two decades with the common sense and practical experience of the American people over the past 170 years. George Washington's final counsel to the Nation warned us that:

> Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness.

We, in Congress, have tolerated the usurpation of constitutional powers and the subversion of religion and morality by an elitist Federal judiciary long enough, especially in the area of school prayer. It is time to put a stop to it, Mr. President. I hope that in this Congress, we will have the courage to take action.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 241

By Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WILSON, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 242. A bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

RELATIVE TO THE USE OF COMPULSORY UNION DUES

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, there is much talk about making major changes in our Federal election laws to remedy perceived problems in the way political campaigns are financed. I've heard no proposal, however, that has focused on what is without question one of the most blatant violations of political freedom—the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes.

Thomas Jefferson, who is my personal hero in the history of this Nation, said, "To compel a man to furnish contributions for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves is sinful and tyrannical." Yet a loophole in the Federal election laws grants organized labor a special privilege enjoyed by no other organization—the power to take money from American workers as a condition of employment and against their will and to contribute that money to political causes and candidates whom the workers themselves do not necessarily support.

The Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended in 1976, has only the appearance of restricting the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes. While the law does prohibit the use of compulsory dues for direct cash contributions to political candidates, it does not—I say again, does not—prohibit the use of forced union dues for a number of other indirect means of supporting union-backed political candidates and causes.

Mr. President, the Department of Justice has recognized the existence of this loophole in our election laws and has endorsed this legislation. Let me read briefly from a letter I received last year from the Department of Justice:

While the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended in 1976, prohibits the use of compulsory dues for direct contributions to political causes and/or candidates, it does not preclude indirect contributions. In our judgment, this omission constitutes an enormous loophole in the law, and one which would be eliminated with the adoption of your bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of the letter be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. There is absolutely no justification, legal or otherwise, for this distinction. The Supreme Court has clearly stated that nonunion employees have a constitutional right to prevent unions from spending compulsory dues to express political views unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representatives. The Court has also made it clear that "[t]he amount at stake for each individual dissenter does not diminish this concern. For, whatever the amount, the quality of respondents' interest in not being compelled to subsidize the propagation of political or ideological views that they oppose is clear." [Chicago Teachers Union versus Hudson (1985)].

Mr. President, despite the clear enunciation of constitutional rights by the Supreme Court, our Federal election laws continue to give organized labor a special privilege enjoyed by no other private association—the right to take money from American workers as a condition of employment and to contribute that money to political causes and candidates whom the workers themselves may not necessarily support.

In light of this legal dichotomy, union officials have divided their political expenditures into two categories. The first is commonly referred to as union hard money. It consists of money given directly to candidates in the form of cash or in-kind contributions taken from funds given voluntarily by union members. This legislation is not intended to affect those contributions.

The second category is referred to as union soft money, spent by union officials on behalf of—but not contributed directly to—political candidates. This soft money comes directly from compulsory union dues. Forced dues finance the operations of union PAC's; it provides extensive in-kind political services; and, in fact, it represents the overwhelming bulk of union political expenditures. Nevertheless, Mr. President, because it is not contributed directly to a candidate, it is neither documented nor reported to the Federal Election Commission. This overwhelming amount of political expenditure remains hidden from the American public.

But, Mr. President, even voluntary PAC contributions from union members originate with compulsory dues soft money. Compulsory dues bankroll the administrative overhead costs of union partisan political fundraisers. Compulsory dues soft money that is used for financing union PAC's runs into many millions of dollars each election cycle. For example, in July 1976, AFL-CIO public relations director, Bernard Albert, admitted that the annual budget of the national COPE alone ran to approximately $2 million.

In spite of the vast sums of compulsory union dues that finance the operating costs of union PAC's, the bulk of compulsory dues soft money goes for unreported, unlimited in-kind political expenditures. Mr. Paul Jensen, Walter Mondale's campaign liaison to organized labor, estimated that the unions' soft money contributions to Mr. Mondale's Presidential campaign was worth about $20 million.

The July 1979 issue of Steelabor, the official newspaper of the United Steelworkers of America, offered its readers a surprisingly candid and straightforward explanation of in-kind political spending. "Union Dues money," reported the union paper, "can't go for direct political contributions—but it can do a lot; mailings supporting or opposing political candidates, phone banks, precinct visits, voter registration, and get-out-the-vote drives."

In spite of these admissions, the account in Steelabor only tells half of the story. To fill out the picture, several key expenditures need to be added to the list: thousands of union employees devoted almost solely to partisan political election day workers paid overtime rates from compulsory dues; millions of political pamphlets and flyers; and paid election-day carpools and babysitters, to name a few.

In the most recent elections, union activity was significantly greater than in any of the prior presidential elections. According to the October 11, 1988, edition of The Washington Post, labor unions went to work for governor Dukakis with "nearly $40 million in cash" and "an army of volunteers * * *." The article reported that the United Auto Workers [UAW] Union planned to mail "more than 1 million personalized, "anti-Bush material at plant gates in the hopes that members will use the material to argue against Bush * * *."

The article also quotes Loretta Bowen, political director of the Communications Workers of America [CWA] as saying:

Many union people have been 'searching desperately for a spark' to help ignite rank-and-file enthusiasm about Dukakis. The CWA * * * has ordered everyone of its 200-member field staff not actively involved in contract negotiations to spend full time on the election.

Mr. President, it is ironic that we would see this admission from an official of the CWA in light of the most recent case decided by the United States Supreme Court regarding the use of union dues for political purposes: Communications Workers of America versus Beck.

In deciding that case, the Court stated that:

Taken as a whole, section 8(a)(3) [of the National Labor Relations Act] permits an employer and a union to enter into an agreement requiring all employees to become union members as a condition of continued employment, but the membership that may be so required has been 'whittled down to its financial core' [citations omitted]. The statutory question presented in this case, then, is whether this 'financial core' includes the obligation to support union activities beyond those germane to collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance adjustment. We think it does not.

Mr. President, these indirect in-kind political expenditures cited in the Post article are not subject to any limitations nor any reporting requirements under the FECA. They are paid for with dues money taken from workers as a condition of employment. Without question they represent the overwhelming bulk of union political expenditures—hidden from the American public.

Mr. President, some opponents of this legislation use convoluted logic in arguing that the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes is somehow analogous to the use of corporate funds to establish political action committees with which stockholders may disagree. They say this legislation would unfairly tip the political balance of power in favor of business interests by restricting only union politics.

This is nonsense, and those who might be confused by this smokescreen argument should read the decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals in Federal Election Commission versus International Association of Machinists. The language of that decision shatters this bogus analogy once and for all.

In that case, Mr. President, attorneys for the International Association of Machinists Union charged that 11 corporations had violated the Federal Elections Campaign Act by soliciting contributions to their political action committees from administrative personnel under what they termed inherently coercive conditions. Although the district court ruled that no such violation had occurred, it did allow several constitutional issues raised by the plaintiffs to be heard by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Union attorneys asked the appeals court to decide, among other constitutional issues, whether the use of general corporate assets to establish and support corporate political action committees violates the first amendment rights of dissenting shareholders. Union attorneys attempted to base their claim on the landmark Supreme Court decision in Abood versus Detroit Board of Education.

In Abood, the Supreme Court held that the first amendment prohibits unions from forcing employees to support political causes against their will through the use of complusory union dues. The union attorneys attempted to draw a parallel between the situation in Abood and the use of treasury funds by corporations to establish and administer PAC's. The court of appeals was not convinced.

The Court of Appeals noted that "in Abood the Supreme Court had held that the first amendment prohibited a public employee union from requiring any employee to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding a job." The Court went on to rule that there was no valid analogy between the union position in FEC versus IAM and the fact situation in Abood because a corporate shareholder is under no compulsion to support a political cause against his will.

Citing another Supreme Court decision, First National Bank of Boston versus Bellotti, the Court of Appeals said "the shareholder invests in a coprorate of his own volition and is free to withdraw his investment at any time and for any reason."

Mr. President, let me reiterate that any campaign reform effort must deal with the abusive use of compulsory union dues. The time has come to return to individual workers the right to choose for themselves which political candidates and causes their dollars will be used to support.

Enactment of this important legislation will guarantee the voluntary nature of each person's participation in the political process by prohibiting the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes. This bill will insure that in matters of political conscience, Federal election laws will be neutral while voluntary participation will continue to be protected.

I respectfully urge my colleagues to give this legislation expeditious consideration.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, May 12, 1988.

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: Thank you for your letter of February 16, 1988, requesting the views of the Department of Justice on S. 615, your bill to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes. I regret the delay in responding.

The Department of Justice has carefully examined the issue addressed in S. 615. We believe the bill executes an appropriate and long-overdue clarification of legislative policy. Unions are currently using mandatory fees for a multitude of different purposes, including activities on behalf of various political causes and candidates. We believe that working men and women should not be forced, as a condition of employment, to contribute to political causes and candidates whom they do not themselves support. It seems clear that a practice which requires them to do so is offensive.

Furthermore, while the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended in 1976, prohibits the use of compulsory dues for direct contributions to political causes and/or candidates, it does not preclude indirect contributions. In our judgment, this omission constitutes an enormous loophole in the law, and one which would be eliminated with the adoption of your bill. A direct and an indirect political expenditure have the same effect: funds contributed by an employee may be used to promote an issue or a candidate which he or she opposes. Thus, a bank only on direct political expenditures does not fully protect the rights of union members or the rights of non-union employees who are obliged to pay agency fees. If unions are able effectively to tap huge reservoirs of money collected pursuant to the conditions of collective bargaining agreements, then they will be able to interject themselves and their institutional preferences into the political arena in a manner inconsistent with the wishes of many of the affected workers. Such a situation plainly has a deleterious effect on political freedom in this country and is highly undesirable and inappropriate.

By promoting pluralism and diversity of opinion, S. 615 would further the Act's original purpose by limiting the economic power of private organizations, such as unions, to purchase political influence through indirect contributions. Moreover, the duty of fair representation embodied in the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) would also be strengthened since a union's use of its economic clout to advance the views of some of its members to the disadvantage of others is inconsistent with notions of equity and fair play.

As your letter noted, the Department took the position, in our amicus brief before the Supreme Court in Communications Workers of America et al. v. Beck (S.Ct. No. 86-73), that a petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit should be granted. We took that view because we believed that the Fourth Circuit's judgement was in conflict with other circuits and that, on the merits, it had erred in interpreting the NLRA and the Constitution. Specifically, we believe that the NLRA embodies a compromise which generally allows employers and unions to demand that all employees pay uniform fees to the union without regard to the subjects on which those fees will be expended.

Our view of the unions existing duty of fair representation flows from our interpretation of statutory rights created by provisions of the NLRA. Moreover, on the constitutional issue, we believe that all conduct relating to the expenditure of agency fees is a product of purely private action and not the "state action" that, of course, is a condition precedent to any successful First Amendment claim. As is proper, the brief does not state the Department's views on the policy issues involved, and does not in any way conflict with our strong support for your bill.

Though we remain convinced that our interpretations of existing law as embodied in the NLRA as well as the applicability of the Constitution are correct, we as a matter of policy believe your bill should be enacted into law. As interpreted by the Supreme Court, both the Railway Labor Act and the Constitution prohibit an employer and union from conditioning an employee's right to work on that employee's contribution to noncollective bargaining causes with which the Employee does not agree. These prohibitions reflect fundamental expressive and associational values of our society; men and women should not be forced into ideological and political associations, especially associations that are fundamentally inconsistent with their own consciences and thoughts. But requiring an individual, on pain of discharge, to contribute over his objection to noncollective bargaining causes does exactly that. Your bill, which is aimed at narrowing existing law, would prevent such ideological and associational compulsion and vindicate these important expressive and associational rights.

In closing, permit me to point out that, while Congress is wise to consider amendments that would institute federal election reform, true reform can only come if defects in existing law are fully exposed and addressed. These include issues such as those raised by S. 615.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of these views to Congress.

Sincerely,

THOMAS M. BOYD,
Acting Assistant Attorney General.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator HELMS in sponsoring S. 242, a bill that would prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for any political expenditures. I share his concern that workers' compulsory union dues may be used to promote political candidates and causes they may not endorse. It is imperative that we return to individual workers the right to choose which candidates and causes to support.

The Federal Election Campaign Act prohibits direct labor union contributions to Federal elections. However, a provision in the act exempts certain political activities. These include communications by a labor organization to its members and their families, get-out-the-vote activities, and the establishment of a separate fund for soliciting contributions to Federal candidates from its members and their families.

This provision creates a gaping loophole in our Federal election laws. In reality, such indirect contributions have as much impact on the political process as direct ones.

In addition, this provision gives labor organizations the power to collect dues from workers as a condition of their employment and then use the money for political purposes. While labor organizations certainly have the right to participate fully in the political process, using forced dues for political purposes is unfair to dissenting union members.

I commend my colleague, Senator HELMS, for introducing legislation that would bring about a needed change in our Federal campaign laws. It is an important step toward protecting the constitutional rights of working men and women.●

By Mr. McCLURE (for himself, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BURNS, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. DASCHLE, and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 243. A bill to provide for the extension of regional referral center classification of certain hospitals under the Medicare Program and to continue the payment rates for such hospitals; to the Committee on Finance.

RURAL REFERENCE CENTER EXTENSION

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with Senators SYMMS, STEVENS, BOREN, ADAMS, BURNS, GRASSLEY, DASCHLE, and DURENBERGER, legislation to permit hospitals designated as rural referral centers to continue their designation for 5 additional years. Current law provides that certain rural hospitals that are classified as referral centers on October 21, 1986, would retain that status through cost reporting periods beginning before October 1, 1989. Our bill would simply extend that status for 5 years, until 1994, for the 226 rural referral centers now designated.

When Congress established the Medicare Prospective Payment System [PPS] in 1983, it recognized the need for special adjustments and exceptions to the amount paid to hospitals that act as regional or national centers for patients transferred from other hospitals. Consequently, payments to all hospitals that qualify as rural referral centers are based on the rate of small urban, rather than rural, areas as adjusted by the hospital's area wage index. In fiscal year 1989, the small urban rate is 11 percent higher than the rate for rural areas.

The rationale for this higher rate of payment is that generally these hospitals offer a variety of services, employ many advanced trained personnel, and have a medical staff composed of many different types of specialists. In these factors and in the services they furnish, they are similar to urban acute care centers, and pay salaries and have costs comparable to those hospitals.

In addition, the criterion for qualification as rural referral center establishes a measure of those hospitals that treat the sickest patients. As a result, rural referral centers treat more severely ill patients and receive cases that tend to be more complex than those in the average rural hospital. The higher costs associated with treatment of these more severe and complex cases are generally not experienced in the average rural hospital. For example, repair and servicing of high-technology equipment not used in other rural hospitals, and the demand for a broader range of drugs and supplies contribute to the higher costs of operating a rural referral center.

Rural referral centers also are expected to have higher labor costs than other rural hospitals because of the need for more specialized care. For example, if a community had two hospitals, one of which was a rural referral center, the average hourly wage in the rural referral center would likely be higher because of the need for more specialized personnel. Specifically, specialized personnel are needed to operate the sophisticated high-technology equipment such as magnetic resonance imaging [MRI] devices, extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters, and cardiac catheterization units commonly found in rural referral centers.

It is important that Congress continue to make available higher payments for rural referral centers. In the State of Idaho, and in 42 other States, rural referral centers are the linchpin of the rural health care network.

Small, isolated rural communities depend on the greater resources of referral centers to supplement the care available at their own local hospitals. Indeed, rural communities are more than ever coming to depend on referral centers for access to health care as other rural hospitals go out of business.

The situation in Idaho is illustrative and, we believe, typical of the important role of referral centers in maintaining access to health care in rural America. Of the 50 hospitals in Idaho, 7 are rural referral centers, but those 7 hospitals account for nearly 50 percent of all hospital admissions in the State.

Paying rural referral centers an adequate price becomes increasingly important as the financial condition of rural hospitals deteriorates. For each year of PPS, rural hospitals have had consistently lower PPS operating margins than urban hospitals.

Mr. President, I would like to submit for the record the current requirements for rural referral center status and the most recently available listing of rural referral centers. For discharges occurring on or after April 1, 1988, rural hospitals with at least 275 beds are classified as rural referral centers. Other rural facilities may qualify if they meet criteria regarding referral patterns and distance traveled by Medicare inpatients.

Under the criteria, rural hospitals must:

First, have a casemix index at least equal to the lesser of the median casemix index value for hospitals under the prospective payment system [PPS] located in urban areas—the national median—or the median index for all nonteaching hospitals located in urban areas in the same region—the regional median; and

Second, have total annual inpatient discharges equal to the greater of 5,000 or the median number of discharges for all urban hospitals located in the same region; and

Third, meet at least one of three additional criteria regarding the specialty status of the medical staff, travel distances for Medicare patients, or volume of referrals.

Rural osteopathic hospitals must meet the same criteria except that the minimum number of annual discharges must be at least 3,000.

Mr. President, I cannot impress upon my colleagues how important retaining rural referral center status is to these hospitals. I ask unanimous consent that the list of hospitals be printed in the RECORD at this point and I urge my fellow Senators to examine this list to see which hospitals will be affected in their States. I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TREATMENT OF REGIONAL REFERRAL CENTERS.

(a) EXTENSION OF REGIONAL REFERRAL CENTER CLASSIFICAITON.—Any hospital that is classified as a regional referral center under section 1886(d)(5)(C)(i) of the Social Security Act as of September 30, 1989, including a hospital so classified as a result of section 9302(d)(2) of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1986, shall continue to be classified as a regional referral center for cost reporting periods beginning on or after October 1, 1989, and before October 1, 1994.

(b) CONTINUATION OF PAYMENT RATE.—In determining the amount that is payable under section 1886(d) of the Social Security Act for a discharge on or after October 1, 1989, from a hospital that is classified as a regional referral center for purposes of payment under such section, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall use the average standardized amount that is applicable to discharges from a hospital that is located in an urban area (other than a large urban area) in the region in which the hospital so classified is located (as such terms are used in such section).

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I join my colleague today, the senior Senator from Idaho, in introducing legislation to extend the period for rural referral center classification for another 5 years.

This designation, which will be discontinued at the end of this year, currently provides additional funding to certain hospitals which meet the criteria under the Medicare Prospective Payment System. Congress established this system, recognizing that regional hospitals serving a large area, need an adjustment to the amount paid to other hospitals. These facilities have been designated as Rural Referral Centers, providing services to small urban areas as opposed to rural.

There are currently 226 such centers, receiving reimbursement payments for individual services at a rate which is only 11 percent higher than that provided for rural hospitals.

I would like to emphasize what my colleague, Senator MCCLURE has already stated, we have 50 hospitals in Idaho and only 7 of those are rural referral centers. Yet, these seven facilities account for half of all the admissions in the State. It is clear to me the importance of the rural referral center designation.

Rural referral centers treat those patients who are most in need, or rather those who are severely ill or have very complex conditions. These patients require a broad range of treatment and supplies. Therefore, the equipment used is more complex and the cost of use and maintenance is much higher than in a rural hospital.

Because these facilities provide services for such a large area, they must be equipped much the same as an urban hospital, offering specialized services and employing several different types of specialists. Essentially, we have a rural hospital serving a large number of people with costs comparable to those of an urban hospital. Therefore, they must be reimbursed accordingly.

Without the rural referral center designation, many hospitals in Idaho, as well as several other States, would have to shut their doors. This would leave thousands of individuals without any health care facility in a reasonable proximity to their homes, requiring them to travel hundreds of miles for treatment and even regular checkups.●

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 244. A bill to require the Administrator of the General Services Administration to encourage the development and use of plastics derived from certain commodities, and to include such products in the General Services Administration inventory for supply to Federal agencies, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY-BASED PLASTICS DEVELOPMENT

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I come before the Senate today to reintroduce the Agricultural Commodity-Based Plastics Development Act of 1989. I am pleased that Senators DIXON, HARKIN, CONRAD, and BURDICK are original cosponsors of this legislation and Congressman DURBIN is introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, the legislation that I am introducing today addresses two important issues; namely, the return to health and prosperity of our Nation's agriculture, and the serious environmental problem we face regarding the disposal of plastic waste.

Farm prosperity occurs when demand for commodities is in balance with the available supply. This was true during the 1970's, when an expanding export market readily consumed the increasing supply of commodities produced by American agriculture.

During the 1980's increased competition abroad has led to zero growth in U.S. agricultural exports. Foreign competitors have increased their agricultural production resulting in an erosion of our international agricultural market share, and excess capacity in U.S. crop production. Unfortunately, there are many indications that these trends will continue.

Clearly, Mr. President, a key step in restoring prosperity to American agriculture is through the development of new nonfood uses for agricultural commodities. It is unlikely that our export market will grow as in the 1970's and consume our excess capacity. Rather, we must harness our own inventiveness to create new opportunities for American agriculture both here and abroad.

The technology exists today to produce agricultural commodity-based plastic products which degrade when disposed of in the environment. These are made by combining starch with conventional plastic resins. The starch used in this process is made from a natural resource that is in great abundance in this country, corn and other grains. A wide variety of items can be produced using these techniques, including plastic packaging, plastic bags, agricultural mulch, milk jugs, dairy tubs, meat trays, diaper liners, fast food containers, industrial containers, and pharmaceutical packaging. Using durable injection molding techniques, such diverse products as children's toys, office supplies, and automobile components are also feasible. When disposed of in an ecologically active environment, such as a landfill, microbes consume the starch, permitting the item to degrade. It has been estimated that corn starch-based plastics could replace 30 to 45 percent of the low-density polyethelyne plastics used each year, producing an additional market for approximately 112 million bushels of corn per year.

Mr. President, the widespread introduction of this technology would benefit the American farmer, whose agricultural commodities are used to produce it. Agricultural commodity-based degradable plastics also address another problem which faces our Nation, that of solid waste disposal.

More than one-half of the cities in the United States will exhaust their current landfill capacity by 1990. The management of this growing volume of solid waste is one of the most urgent and fundamental environmental problems facing Federal, State, and local officials. Plastics comprise 7 percent of the 150 million tons of solid waste produced in this country each year. By the year 2000, this is expected to rise to 10 percent. Clearly, there is no single answer to the problems of our rapidly filling landfills. Indeed, a solution must involve a number of initiatives, including recycling, new incineration technologies, and modifying our use and disposal of solid waste. An important component of this will be the increased use of degradable plastic products.

Mr. President, this legislation will provide incentives for further private sector market development of this technology through the preferential procurement of degradable plastics products by the Federal Government. Special emphasis will be placed on agricultural commodity-based technologies. It directs the General Services Administration to identify, and make available to its Government customers, degradable plastics products. Twenty million dollars is authorized for each of 3 years to cover the additional cost of procuring these items. It also establishes an interagency working group to develop and coordinate the implementation of the act.

New nonfood uses for our agricultural commodities are not futuristic fantasies requiring years to develop. Today corn starch is used in the manufacture of paper products, building materials, textiles, and adhesives. Three to five billion pounds of U.S.-produced fats and oils are used in nonfood products each year. But this is not enough. We must continue to aggressively pursue new markets and to develop new uses for our farm products.

I want to emphasize that the problems facing American agriculture and the disposal of municipal waste are complex. They will not be solved quickly, rather they require a forward-looking strategy to help return our agricultural communities to prosperity and to address this very serious environmental concern facing our Nation's cities. I believe that the legislation that I am proposing today is a part of that solution.

Mr. President, some of my colleagues are also concerned with these problems and will be introducing similar initiatives which recognize the benefits of developing new nonfood uses for agricultural commodities. I look forward to their support and urge my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 244

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Commodity-Based Plastics Development Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) the achievement of long-term health for the agriculture sector of the United States is essential to the vitality of the national economy, the well-being of our citizens and rural communities, and the maintenance of national security;

(2) the development of new non-food uses for agricultural commodities will reduce crop surpluses, raise farm income, and lower the cost of agricultural subsidies provided by the Federal government;

(3) the economic security of the United States requires that the Federal government should promote the development and use of products derived from agricultural commodities through the preferential procurement of such products to reach a threshold level of commercial application at which such products can successfully compete;

(4) more than one-half of the cities in the United States will exhaust their current landfill capacity by 1990, and the management of this growing volume of solid waste is one of the most urgent and fundamental environmental problems facing Federal, State, and local officials;

(5) plastic products comprise a significant amount of the 150,000,000 tons of solid waste produced in the United States and the use of degradable plastics products made from agricultural commodities can provide a positive impact in solving the problem of solid waste disposal;

(6) the technology exists to develop and market degradable agricultural commodity-based plastics for use in packaging, agricultural mulching, and in other applications;

(7) the widespread introduction of the technology referred to in paragraph (6) into the commercial marketplace will provide a new outlet for United States agricultural products;

(8) the use of domestically produced agricultural commodity-based degradable plastics products will reduce the reliance of the United States on imported oil and result in an improved trade balance for the United States and increased employment opportunities for our citizens; and

(9) the Federal government should assist in bringing agricultural commodity-based degradable plastics to a level of commercial application comparable to other alternative products and should provide incentives for the development and adoption of such products.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to provide—

(1) that the Federal Government shall—

(A) promote the continued development of degradable plastics technology by increasing the purchases of degradable plastics products, with special emphasis on agricultural commodity-based products;

(B) assist State and local entities in purchasing degradable plastics products;

(C) provide incentives for further technology development through the preferential procurement of degradable plastics products, with special emphasis on agricultural commodity-based technologies;

(D) promote the manufacture and purchase of degradable plastics products by assisting producers in demonstrating the capability of this technology;

(E) increase the commercial availability of agricultural commodity-based degradable plastics products;

(F) support existing Federal, State, local, and privately sponsored degradable plastics programs; and

(G) be provided with advice concerning the status of research in new non-food uses for agricultural commodities; and

(2) for the establishment of an interagency working group to develop and coordinate the implementation of this Act.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in addition to our traditional uses, research in alternative uses of agricultural commodities has demonstrated that there are vast new industrial markets for agricultural products. Alternative users—such as soybean ink, road deicers, and degradable plastics—offer new opportunities for reliable domestic markets.

Degradable plastics enable us to utilize our Nation's renewable agricultural resources in an effort to combat many of the serious environmental problems looming over us. Although not the only or final solution, cornstarch plastics offer an important response to the pressing environmental problem of solid waste disposal. Plastics comprise 7 percent of the 150 million tons of solid waste produced in this country each year. By the year 2000, this is expected to rise to 10 percent. By 1990, more than half of the cities in the United States will exhaust their current landfills.

At the same time, the commercialization of degradable cornstarch plastics will provide an important step in restoring prosperity to farmers. It has been estimated that the use of agricultural commodity-based plastics could create a new market for approximately 150 million bushels of corn each year.

Mr. President, today, we possess technologies to produce degradable plastic products at costs competitive to, or cheaper than, nondegradable plastics. Cornstarch, combined with conventional plastic resins, can be utilized to produce a whole host of products. We currently see these uses in plastic packaging, plastic bags, milk jugs, food trays, foam cups, and oil bottles.

I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of Senator GLENN's bill, "the Agricultural Commodity-Based Plastics Development Act of 1989." This bill will play an important role in promoting the development and use of degradable plastics markets. There are 20 to 30 degradable cornstarch plastic items that are currently available for utilization. By including these products in the General Services Administration's inventory, we are affirming that our Federal Government is committed to the development of these new agricultural products in practice, as well as in theory.

Degradable cornstarch plastics, and other alternative uses of our agricultural products, will greatly contribute to the restoration of a viable agricultural economy. They will enable us to meet the many environmental challenges threatening us today, while at the same time offering new economic opportunities for our rural communities.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

By Mr. PRYOR:

S. 245. A bill to prohibit the Federal Asset Disposition Association from paying severance pay in excess of certain civil service amounts; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

RELATIVE TO SEVERANCE PAY PAID BY FADA

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, on September 24, 1988, I read an article in the Washington Post that made my blood boil. Because of efforts during the 100th Congress to abolish the agency, the Federal Asset Disposition Association had apparently adopted a "golden parachute" plan for its employees that would give each person 4 months pay and other benefits as a severance payment.

FADA's press release, dated June 22, 1988, did not put a dollar figure on the severance plan, but the Washington Post article estimated the cost at $8 million in Federal Home Loan Bank Board funds.

At that time I made a statement on the Senate floor regarding this issue and I introduced a bill that would have prevented any severance payment to any FADA employee beyond the normal civil service severance pay.

Mr. President, I want to once again emphasize that at a time when total savings and loan red ink has been estimated at over $105 billion and the FHLBB does not have sufficient funds to do its job, I feel the people at FADA have sent a clear message to Congress and the American people about their dedication to saving the failing thrift industry. They have elected to place their own financial security above the financial security of millions of savings and loan depositors across this country.

FADA was under fire for most of the 100th Congress, and reports of incompetence, greed and cronyism within the agency were common. As a result, numerous efforts were made in the House and Senate to abolish FADA.

Shortly after the 100th Congress adjourned, rumors began to circulate that the FHLBB was in the process of trying to sell FADA to a group of investors headed by FADA's controversial chief, Gerald Carmen. I expressed my view to FHLBB Chairman Danny Wall that any such decision should not be made until the 101st Congress convened, and I am pleased that FADA has not yet been sold.

I believe that Congress should have the right to abolish FADA, which overlaps in duties with the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and I am not at all certain that the FHLBB would have the power to sell FADA if it wanted to.

The General Accounting Office reported to me last year that FADA was improperly established by the FHLBB, that it is an agency of the Federal Government, and that its employees are subject to Federal pay limitations and other restrictions. FADA and the FHLBB have rejected this conclusion, and FADA still regards itself as an independent federally chartered entity.

If FADA would admit that its employees are Federal employees, they would be entitled to severance pay based on their time of service. Instead, FADA has chosen to continue to show its arrogance and incompetence to Congress and the American people by adopting a severance plan that will be paid by the drastically underfunded FHLBB. Given the possibility of a taxpayer bailout of the FHLBB, the American taxpayer may ultimately pay for FADA's golden parachute plan.

29-059 O-90-32 (Pt. 1)

Today, I am again introducing a bill that orders the FHLBB to issue a regulation prohibiting FADA from making payments under its severance plan greater than the applicable civil service severance pay. I cannot, and Congress should not, stand by and allow FADA to rob a fund that is intended to be for the protection of our Nation's savings and loan depositors.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 245

Be it enacted in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PROHIBITION ON SEVERANCE PAY IN EXCESS OF CIVIL SERVICE AMOUNTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board shall issue a regulation to be effective on and after ————, 198- prohibiting the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Federal Asset Disposition Association from taking any action on after such date which would result in the payment of an amount to any officer, employee, or agent of the Federal Asset Disposition Association, as severance pay in excess of the amount described in subsection (b).

(b) LIMITATION ON AMOUNT OF SEVERANCE PAY.—The amount described in this subsection is the amount of severance pay to which an employee would be entitled pursuant to section 5595 of title 5, United States Code, if the salary of the employee, on an annual basis, were equal to the annual rate of basic pay payable for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule at the time such payment is made.●

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 246. A bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 with respect to the activities of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

S. 247. A bill to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of State energy conservation programs carried out pursuant to such act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

STATE ENERGY CONSERVATION PROGRAMS IMPROVEMENT ACT

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that will reduce the number of American jobs being exported overseas, while at the same time strengthen the United States' role in Third World development.

The Overseas Private Investment Corporation Improvement Act of 1989 will address problems that, in my view, have pervaded OPIC's operations for a number of years.

OPIC insures certain capital investments made by U.S. multinational companies and banks in less developed countries against the risks of war, expropriation, currency inconvertibility, and civil strife.

By doing so, OPIC has often encouraged the export of U.S. jobs, technology, and capital overseas.

The original intent of OPIC was to facilitate U.S. private sector initiatives in less-developed countries. I believe that OPIC does fulfill this important function.

What better way to promote Third World social and economic progress during a time of tight domestic budgets than to encourage private investment overseas? Unfortunately, OPIC has gone beyond its original congressional mandate.

All too often, OPIC insurance is used by U.S. companies to take advantage of cheap foreign labor, costing thousands of jobs here at home. U.S. corporations are entitled to make their own business decisions, but the U.S. Government should not be providing them with the economic incentive to move factories and payrolls out of the country.

Let's look at recent statistics. According to the AFL-CIO, the Nation suffered a net loss of 1.6 million manufacturing jobs since 1979. In 1987, only one in seven jobs in the United States was in manufacturing.

Twelve out of twenty-nine OPIC-sponsored projects—or more than 40 percent of all new projects in 1986—were in manufacturing.

According to OPIC's own fiscal year 1987 annual report, OPIC supported projects to produce catalytic converters, automobile radiators, and tooling systems in Korea; air-conditioning components in the People's Republic of China; computer components in Thailand; spark plugs in India; and garment assembly in Haiti.

OPIC insured the building of a Hilton Hotel in China, backed numerous banking projects for Citibank, and helped with an oil drilling project in Yemen.

Our domestic oil producers are suffering; oil industry workers have lost their jobs. Why should the Federal Government—through OPIC be involved in helping to drill for oil in the Mid-East?

OPIC, when screening overseas investments, is supposed to ensure that there won't be any significant adverse impact on U.S. employment.

OPIC has not been doing its job on that score for many years.

Mr. President, this is not the first time that I have endeavored to address the problems at OPIC. Four years ago I offered an amendment to OPIC's reauthorization, which called on the GAO to study the impact of OPIC activities on employment here in the United States.

GAO came back with some disturbing findings. GAO found that 20 of the 33 OPIC projects it examined were expected to have negative consequences on U.S. employment. GAO also criticized OPIC's method for assessing this impact. Let me quote from the GAO report, issued in May of 1987:

> It is prudent for OPIC, in its analyses of proposed overseas projects, to make certain assumptions concerning the possible effects of a project. However, when OPIC uses these assumptions to mathematically compute the effects on U.S. trade and employment of a proposed projects, it obscures the direct adverse effects of a project * * *. The Congress and other interested parties may be misled concerning the magnitude of U.S. economic benefits from OPIC-assisted projects. (Emphasis added.)

A central point in the bill I am introducing today requires OPIC to adopt all of the GAO's recommendations, in the hope that misleading economic analyses can become a thing of the past.

Last year, when OPIC again came before the Congress for reauthorization, I tried once again to put a stop to the inappropriate aspects of its operations. The amendment I offered then is the basis for the bills I am offering today.

In addition to requiring the adoption of the GAO recommendations, my bill will stop OPIC from insuring manufacturing projects overseas when they move U.S. jobs abroad. Under my bill, OPIC can't insure, reinsure or guarantee a project, if it believes that imports into the United States from that project will exceed 10 percent of the total output of the project. Also, should a project be financed by OPIC and then wind up shipping more than 10 percent of its products to the United States, OPIC would have to terminate its support.

And, finally, my bill would stop OPIC from insuring, reinsuring, or guaranteeing banking, oil drilling, and hotel projects.

There's no reason why OPIC should provide the economic incentive necessary for such well-heeled businesses as Hilton Hotels and Citibank to do business abroad. Neither should OPIC be involved in oil projects overseas when wellheads in Oklahoma and Texas are being capped and the domestic energy industry overall is in a slump.

The amendment I offered last year was defeated, in my view, because its intent was misunderstood. That amendment, and this bill, are not protectionist, do not leave existing OPIC projects high and dry, and most of all, this legislation does not destroy OPIC's legitimate role in Third World development.

Mr. President, I am confident that in the absence of last year's end-of-session pressures, this bill will win broad support. Constraints on time may have contributed to misunderstandings during the debate last year. I believe that with the latitude now available to us, we can work together with OPIC to correct problems of job export while strengthening private sector involvement in Third World development.

After consideration of my OPIC amendment last year, I was impressed by the responsible and serious tone of a letter I received from the then president and C.E.O. of OPIC, Craig A. Nalen.

He said "Let me assure you that we are not unaware of your concerns with regard to the GAO report and the matter of creating U.S. jobs. I pledge to you that my staff will work with you and the committee in an attempt to satisfy your concerns in this critical area."

President Bush has nominated former Ambassador Fred M. Zeder II to replace Mr. Nalen. I am hopeful that the new leader of OPIC will retain the positive, progressive outlook of his predecessor, as indicated in this letter.

I believe that the provisions of my bill address real problems—systemic problems—at OPIC.

I am not unaware, however, that solutions to problems of this magnitude require cooperation and bipartisan support.

Mr. President, it is with this spirit in mind that I introduce the Overseas Private Investment Corporation Improvement Act of 1989.

Answers to tough problems are found when people look for them together, cooperatively. However, let no one underestimate my view of the gravity of this situation, and my commitment to making changes in the way OPIC does business.

STATE ENERGY CONSERVATION PROGRAMS IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. President, I rise to introduce the State Energy Conservation Programs Improvement Act of 1989.

I believe that this bill will make an important contribution toward solving a number of serious energy and environmental problems facing our Nation.

Almost everyone agrees that we must develop policies to curb rising oil imports, air pollution, the greenhouse effect, and high energy costs which hurt businesses and consumers. Luckily, there is a single solution which will address all of these problems in a cost-effective and environmentally sound manner-increased energy conservation.

In response to the 1970's energy crisis, Congress enacted the Energy Policy and Conservation Act [EPCA] in 1974. Among other things, that law authorized several programs which provide Federal grants to State and local governments for specified energy conservation activities.

Clearly, Congress recognized the essential role of State and local governments in promoting energy conservation and reducing the Nation's rising level of energy consumption. With this assistance, the States have made significant strides in conserving energy, despite repeated attempts by the Reagan administration to eliminate all funding.

The Weatherization Program has provided money and assistance to low-income families, who spend an inordinate share of their income on heating and cooling bills. The State Energy Conservation Program has allowed States to develop energy conservation goals and plans for meeting their targets.

The Institutional Conservation Program has provided much needed matching grants to schools and hospitals for conservation investments that help reduce their costs in providing education and health services.

Nevertheless, a lot has changed since EPCA was enacted.

The States and the Federal Government have learned a great deal about energy conservation programs and technologies. Individual States have developed new and innovative approaches to energy conservation. We now need to update the State and local assistance programs to incorporate these successful programs.

This bill which I am introducing today authorizes a number of new programs which States may implement with their Federal dollars. The bill also establishes a system to better coordinate the energy conservation efforts of the various State governments and the Federal Government.

Finally, the bill gives States more flexibility to implement programs which are best suited to their particular conditions and needs.

In recent years, as energy supplies have been abundant and prices have dropped, energy conservation has been put out to pasture.

For the last 8 years, we have consumed energy without a thought for tomorrow. The Reagan administration relaxed standards for automobile efficiency, fought energy efficiency standards for household appliances, and sought access for oil and gas drilling in national wildlife refuges and sensitive offshore areas.

These shortsighted policies pollute the environment, hurt consumers, and speed global warming.

Furthermore, these policies put U.S. industries at a competitive disadvantage in international markets. For example, the United States spends about 10 percent of its GNP on energy, while Japan spends only 5 percent.

Moreover, the trend toward greater energy consumption has caused oil imports to grow at an alarming rate, threatening national security and increasing the national trade deficit. In fact, the Department of Commerce just recently made a finding that oil imports pose a threat to our national security.

The bill I am introducing today may seem minor in scope, but I believe that its significance will become apparent in the coming years. Although the Reagan administration was content to leave energy policy to the marketplace, and Congress is unable to agree on the components of a Federal energy policy, we must give the States the authority to pursue successful programs which meet their needs.

This bill represents a small step toward a more energy efficient America. I hope that we will begin to recognize the importance of energy conservation before another energy crisis requires drastic measures.

This bill is good public policy, and I look forward to working with my colleagues in the Senate toward its enactment.●

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 248. A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to provide increased penalties for certain major frauds against the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MAJOR FRAUD ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, last year, I joined with my colleagues joined together to pass the Major Fraud Act of 1988. This legislation was an important step in curbing the losses which our taxpayers suffer as a result of major fraud in connection with multimillion-dollar Government contracts.

Today, I am introducing a bill which will amend the Major Fraud Act of 1988 to provide a financial incentive to individuals who furnish information leading to the conviction of contractors for major fraud against the United States. This bill will permit a court, upon application by the Attorney General, to pay up to $250,000 to a qualified individual who has disclosed the existence of fraud against the Government. This provision does not give windfalls to informants. The award provision may only be invoked when the information furnished leads to a criminal conviction and the individual receiving the award did not participate in the criminal violation.

The need for whistleblower incentives in evident. Just last year, information provided by an informant led to the indictment of two major defense contractors. The Hazeltine Corp. pled guilty to fraud in connection with a $150 million contract. The Teledyne Corp. was indicated for fraud in connection with a $100 million contract. These actions may never have been brought had someone not blown the whistle. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Washington Post and New York Times articles on the Hazeltine and Teledyne cases.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follow:

MAJOR DEFENSE FIRM ADMITS CONSPIRACY; SECOND CONTRACTOR CHARGED WITH BRIBERY

(By Caryle Murphy and Ruth Marcus)

A major defense firm pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy charges and a second company was charged with bribing a Navy contracting official in the first major court action of the long-running federal probe into military procurement corruption.

The Navy official, Stuart E. Berlin, is accused of engaging in a racketeering scheme with two defense consultants to sell them inside information and steer Navy contracts to their clients.

Hazeltine Corp., a Long Island, N.Y., electronics firm, agreed to pay nearly $2 million in criminal fines, civil penalties and court costs. It pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, conversion of federal property and making a false statement in efforts to obtain a $150 million contract for aircraft radar testing devices.

In addition, two former Hazeltine officials, Joseph R. Colarusso, 58, and Charles A. Furciniti, 54, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the federal government and to commit wire fraud. The men admitted obtaining inside information about competitor's bids and Pentagon buying plans through two defense consultants, William L. Parkin and Fred H. Lackner. The consultants allegedly got the information by bribing Berlin.

In a 27-count indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, another defense contractor, Teledyne Industries Inc., and three of its officials were charged along with the consultants and Berlin in a bribery-conspiracy scheme. The indictment alleged they used Berlin's position at the Naval Air Systems Command to influence the June 1987 award of a $24 million contract for aircraft radar test sets to Teledyne Electronics, a subsidiary of Teledyne Industries.

Berlin, Parkin and Lackner were also charged with theft of government property, mainly confidential contracting information, as well as with racketeering and a racketeering conspiracy count. The indictment accuses Lackner, Parkin, Teledyne and its subsidiary's vice president for contracts, George H. Kaub, of making false statements in order to hide the consultants' help in getting the contract.

In what Justice Department sources described as an important development in the case, former Teledyne marketing representative Michael J. Savaides, 41, pleaded guilty to conspiring with the consultants to bribe Berlin. Under the terms of his plea agreement, Savaides is required to cooperate with the government.

The indictment and guilty pleas, entered before U.S. District Court Judge Claude M. Hilton, represent the first fruits of a Justice Department investigation that began September 1986 into alleged bribery and fraud in the Pentagon's $150 billion-a-year procurement system.

The probe, codenamed Ill Wind, used extensive wiretaps and erupted into public last June when Federal Bureau of Investigation agents searched offices and homes of dozens of defense firms and private consultants nationwide who advise defense firms on what weapons the Pentagon may want. Disclosure of suspected procurement frauds has fueled debate in Congress and elsewhere over ways to tighten Pentagon management and costs.

The charges disclosed yesterday relate to only one facet of the many-sided probe. Although Ill Wind was once touted as one of the most massive military corruption scandals in history, some law enforcement officials now assert that it was exaggerated by the news media.

U.S. Attorney Henry E. Hudson of Alexandria, whose office is coordinating the probe, said yesterday's action "represents just a small percentage of" the investigation. "Over the next few months, perhaps the next year, you'll see a great deal of additional activity," Hudson said.

"The citizens of the United States have an absolute right to the honest services of public officials, and when individuals are receiving money for violating rules and regulations and passing confidential information, I think it strikes at the very heart of the procurement process, and that's what makes this a serious case," Hudson said.

He said yesterday's pleas and future prosecution actions will deter future defense procurement wrongdoing and ensure "that there is integrity in the process."

Assistant Attorney General Edward S.G. Dennis Jr. called it "a very significant indictment. The charges here are very significant."

The indictment alleges that Parkin and his consulting company were to receive $160,000 from Teledyne and $100,000 to $150,000 from Hazeltine for helping them win the contracts. Parkin allegedly split the money with Lackner, a close friend of Berlin's.

In turn, Berlin, a supervisory electronics engineer, allegedly received at least $2,500 from Lackner and Parkin for his help on the Hazeltine contract and an unspecified sum for his work on the Teledyne contract, which the company eventually won.

The court papers filed yesterday allege that Berlin, described by the two consultants as a "silent partner" helping Teledyne, was to receive $25,000 over two years, beginning last spring. However, the court papers offer little direct evidence that Berlin received the money.

Berlin's lawyer declined to comment yesterday. If convicted of all counts, Berlin could get 185 years in prison and $5.5 million in fines.

A Navy spokesman, Lt. Brian Cullin, said yesterday that Navy officials are reviewing the allegations against Berlin, who continues to work for the Navy but was removed from procurement duties in June after the probe became public. "They've got to review how serious the indictment is" before deciding what further action to take, if any, Cullin said.

Hazeltine's agreement to pay a $1 million criminal fine, $500,000 in civil penalties and $410,000 in court costs is far less than some of the huge fines defense firms have paid in recent years for contracting fraud. If convicted of all counts, Teledyne could be fined up to $6.5 million.

In contrast, Sundstrand Corp. in October agreed to pay $115 million to settle charges that it concealed or falsely billed millions of dollars in cost overruns, and paid more than $100,000 in illegal gratuities to Defense Department employees.

Asked if the Hazeltine fines might be a paltry sum to a defense contractor seeking a $150 million contract, Hudson said, "We thought they were appropriate and that's why we recommended them."

Sources familiar with the investigation said Hazeltine is not expected to be disbarred from receiving military contracts, a possible sanction for companies convicted of procurement fraud. In a statement, Hazeltine, which was not charged with any knowledge that its consultants were obtaining the inside information through bribes, emphasized it had "cooperated fully" with prosecutors. Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph J. Aronica repeated this point yesterday before Hilton.

Defense Department spokesmen said they were reviewing Hazeltine's plea and the allegations against Teledyne.

Navy and Air Force spokesmen said the assistant secretaries in charge of acquisition must approve future purchases under the Teledyne contract, which remains in effect. The Navy plans to buy 43 more of the handheld radar beacon test sets this year. Teledyne said the contract has been worth $12 million to date.

In a statement, Hazeltine said its plea was "acknowledgement of responsibility for the unauthorized actions of two former Hazeltine officers . . . which were clearly against specific company policies."

The actions of Colarusso and Furciniti, the statement said, "began prior to the December 1986 acquisition of Hazeltine by Emerson [Electric Co.] and continued thereafter without the knowledge of Hazeltine or Emerson."

Colarusson and Furciniti, who face a maximum penalty of five years in jail and a $250,000 fine, will be sentenced March 17, Hilton set April 28 for the sentencing of Savaides, who faces similar maximum punishment. All three must cooperate with investigators and testify, if called, at upcoming trials as part of their plea agreements.

A spokesman for Teledyne, Berkley Baker, said, "We expect to be acquitted and we will defend ourselves against charges." He added that the firm also expects its three employees, placed on administrative leave with pay yesterday, will be acquitted.

Ill Wind received little response from lawmakers yesterday.

A 12:30 p.m. briefing for senators by Dennis and Assistant Attorney General Thomas Boyd was postponed when the indictment was delayed because a grand juror, slowed by the snow, had to be retrieved by a four-wheel-drive vehicle, Justice Department officials offered to reschedule the briefing for yesterday afternoon, but Senate leaders reportedly said, "Never mind."

OPERATION ILL WIND: NEW CHARGES AND PLEAS

A federal grand jury yesterday returned the first indictment in the Pentagon procurement investigation. Accused of crimes including conspiracy, racketeering, bribery, and theft of government property are:

INDICTED

Teledyne Electronics, a Newbury Park, Calif., defense contractor, Teledyne is accused of agreeing to pay William L. Parkin's firm $160,000 to secure inside information to get a Navy contract.

Stuart E. Berlin, a Navy procurement specialist. Berlin is the only government employee indicted in the case so far. He headed the ship systems engineering branch of the Naval Air Systems Command from October 1986 to June 1988. Berlin "corruptly" accepted "a sum of U.S. currency, for himself from [Fred H.] Lackner and [William L.] Parkin," the indictment says. Berlin is accused of violating laws against using inside information for private gain and against not disclosing procurement documents; court documents say he provided information to Teledyne and Hazeltine Corp. An affidavit released this week said that Berlin received about $1,000 every few months from Parkin and Lackner in exchange for classified documents.

William L. Parkin, an Alexandria consultant who worked in the Navy's Joint Cruise Missile Project from 1977 to 1983. The indictment alleges the conspiracy included Parkin's agreement to bribe Stuart E. Berlin for information. Affidavits call Parkin "a middleman who paid government employees for inside information and sold it to contractors."

Fred H. Lackner, a Woodland Hills, Calif., consultant who has worked for several aerospace firms. The indictment said the alleged conspiracy included Berlin's agreement with Lackner to help Teledyne win a contract in return for money.

Also named in the indictment were Teledyne employees George H. Kaub, Eugene R. Sullivan, and Dale Schnittjer. The indictment charges all the defendants with conspiring to defraud the Navy and the Air Force, bribe a public official, make false statements and commit wire fraud. Berlin, Parkin and Lackner face up to 185 years in prison and $5.5 million in fines each, if convicted on all charges.

Also yesterday, three men and a defense contractor entered the first guilty pleas in the probe:

PLEADED GUILTY

Hazeltine Corp. of Greenlawn, N.Y., a division of Emerson Electric Co., agreed to plead guilty to conspiracy to defraud the United States, conversion of government property, and making false statements to the government.

Joseph Colarusso, former senior vice president of Hazeltine and a 29-year employee before his resignation last month, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to defraud the government and commit wire fraud.

Charles Furciniti, a former Hazeltine marketing vice president, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to defraud the government and commit wire fraud. He and Colarusso could each face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Michael Savaides, a Washington lobbyist for Teledyne, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery and could get up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

FIRST INDICTMENTS RETURNED BY JURY IN PENTAGON FRAUD

(By Philip Shenon)

WASHINGTON, Januanry 6.—A Federal grand jury returned its first indictments today against a military contractor, a former Pentagon official and five other individuals in the two-year investigation of fraud and bribery in military weapons procurement. Another contractor and two of its former executives pleaded guilty in a Federal court to similar charges growing out of the investigation.

Teledyne Industries, a unit of Teledyne Inc., based in Los Angeles, was indicted along with a Navy procurement specialist and five other individuals on charges of conspiracy, bribery, racketeering and theft of Government property.

The indictment was announced only hours after another military contractor, the Hazeltine Corporation of Greenlawn, L.I., pleaded guilty in the District Court in Alexandria, Va., to related charges involving Pentagon contracts for electronic equipment.

AN EDGE IN BIDDING

The Justice Department's inquiry has focused on charges that private consultants and some of the nation's largest military contractors bribed Pentagon officials for secret information that gave the companies an edge in bidding for lucrative contracts.

Hazeltine, a division of the Emerson Electric Company of St. Louis, agreed to pay a $1 million fine and $900,000 in other costs. Emerson had sales last year of $6.7 billion.

At a news conference, the prosecutor overseeing the investigation, Henry E. Hudson, the United States Attorney in Alexandria, was pressed repeatedly to explain why the Justice Department had agreed to a fine that represented only a small portion of Emerson's revenues. "We think it was appropriate," he said without elaboration.

OTHER COMPANIES SCRUTINIZED

Mr. Hudson indicated that other indictments and guilty pleas were likely in the investigation. "In the next few months, you'll see a great deal of additional activity," he said. The Justice Department has identified more than 20 companies that are under scrutiny.

Pentagon officials said the criminal case against Hazeltine had already been referred to a Defense Department panel that has the power to suspend future contracts with the company.

Teledyne is almost certain to face suspension since it, unlike Hazeltine, has refused to plead guilty and cooperate with prosecutors. In the past, military contractors charged with crimes have been suspended from bidding for Government work.

At the center of the cases against both Teledyne and Hazeltine are three men named today as defendants in the 27-count indictment: Stuart E. Berlin, a mid-level procurement official with the Navy's Space and Naval Warfare Systems Command; William L. Parkin, a former Navy employee who is now a private military consultant, and another private consultant, Fred H. Lackner.

The indictment accused the consultants of conspiring to bribe Mr. Berlin, a close friend of Mr. Lackner, to obtain information sought by Teledyne and Hazeltine for contracts.

In court papers made public earlier this week, the Justice Department said that Mr. Berlin received a $1,000 payment every few months.

INFORMATION FROM WIRETAPS

The indictment made it clear that much of the prosecution's case against the defendants resulted from court-authorized wiretaps. In several instances, the 80-page indictment quotes liberally from phone conversations between Mr. Parkin, who was a private consultant to both Teledyne and Hazeltine, and Mr. Lackner.

During a phone conversation in May 1987, the indictment said, Mr. Parkin told Mr. Lackner that he had just received a $4,000 check from Hazeltine and that, "I'll have to give you a little green to do what we have to do."

During a separate phone conversation in November 1987, it added, Mr. Parkin advised an executive of Teledyne that he would need money for his information because "it takes a lot of spaghetti and meatballs to grease the skids on some of these things." The indictment said that in other conversations Mr. Parkin and Mr. Lackner discussed their payments to Mr. Berlin.

Through their lawyers, the defendants denied wrongdoing.

In its agreement with prosecutors, Hazeltine pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the United States, conversion of Government property and making false statements to the Government.

Two former company employees, Joseph Colarusso, who was an executive vice president, and Charles Furciniti, a marketing representative, pleaded guilty to one count of defrauding the Government and wire fraud. They each face a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The charges focused on Hazeltine's efforts to secure a $150 million contract for electronic testing equipment. Because of the criminal investigation, the contract has not yet been awarded.

The Hazletine employees worked at the company under two different heads. Robert H. Clark Jr. was the chairman until he was succeeded in 1986 by Salvatore J. Nuzzo.

TIES TO BOTH CONSULTANTS

Also pleading guilty today was a former marketing director for Teledyne Industries Mechael Savaides, who had ties to both Mr. Parkin and Mr. Lackner, the private consultants.

The indictment depicts Mr. Savaides as something of an industrial spy—working for Teledyne but actually feeding company secrets to Mr. Parkin. If the charges in the indictment are true, Mr. Parkin was receiving secret information from both the Pentagon through Mr. Berlin and Mr. Lackner, and from within the corporate offices of Teledyne through Mr. Savaides.

Mr. Savaides pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit bribery and could face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. His testimony is expected to be critical in the prosecution of his former employer, Teledyne.

Prosecutors said the indictment against Teledyne involved the company's successful bid for a $100 million contract to build equipment related to aircraft identification for the military. The contract may now be in jeopardy. In a statement, the Pentagon said the Navy would review all documents released by the Justice Department today to determine whether it should suspend or debar Teledyne and any of the individuals named as defendants.

SMALL PART OF REVENUES

If convicted on all charges. Teledyne Industries could face a maximum fine of $6.5 million. The fine would represent only a tiny portion of the parent's company's revenues, which totaled more than $4 billion in 1987.

Others named as defendants in the Teledyne indictment were: George Kaub, a vice president in charge of contracts at Teledyne Electronics, a division of Teldyne; Eugene R. Sullivan, a former vice president for finance at Teledyne Electronics, and David Schnittjer, who succeeded Mr. Sullivan.

Mr. Kaub, Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Schnittjer were all charged with conspiracy, bribery and wire fraud. If convicted, Mr. Kaub would face a maximum penalty of 85 years in prison and a $2.5 million fine. Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Schnittjer could each face up to 50 years in prison and a $1.5 million fine.

At the time that Teledyne and its executives are accused to the wrongdoing, the company was headed by Henry E. Singleton, its chairman and chief executive officer. He was not named in the indictments.

Mr. Berlin and the two private consultants, Mr. Parkin and Mr. Lackner, were also indicted on racketeering charges and conspiring to engage in racketeering activities. They could each be sentenced to 185 years in prison and ordered to pay fines up to $5.5 million.

ACCUSED OF PROVIDING DATA

Mr. Berlin was accused of providing the consultants with secret information about Navy bidding procedures. He was also charged in the indictment with accepting payment "for his assistance in manipulating the procurement process to insure that" Teledyne and Hazeltine were awarded military contracts.

Prosecutors said, for example, that Mr. Berlin encouraged other Navy officials in 1987 to limit bidding on a Navy contract to just two companies, one of them Hazeltine.

In private conversations between Mr. Parkin and Mr. Lackner, the indictment said, the consultants referred to Mr. Berlin as their "silent partner."

Prosecutors said the indictment and guilty pleas announced today were only the first of what they said would be waves of criminal charges resulting from the investigation, which is known at the Justice Department as Operations III Wind.

The investigation into the Pentagon's $150 billion-a-year procurement system began in 1986 following a tip that a private consultant was peddling classified Pentagon information to military contractors. The Naval Investigation Service used the information to trap the consultant, who agreed to become an informant on Pentagon insiders.

PENTAGON FRAUD: INDICTMENTS AND GUILTY PLEAS

The companies and some of those involved in the Government's investigation of fraud in weapons procurement.

Hazeltine Corporation: A Greenlawn, L.I., manufacturer of military electronics systems. In 1986, the company, which also has plants in Massachusetts, was bought by the Emerson Electric Company of St. Louis. In 1988, Hazeltine had sales of about $158 million, 2.4 percent of Emerson's $6.7 billion in revenues.

Teledyne Industries: A subsidiary of Teledyne Inc. of Los Angeles, is a major manufacturer of airplane engines, making half the general aviation piston engines in the United States. The company also makes airframe structures, robot and remote control aircrafts, spacecraft and drone systems. Its sales for the nine months ended Sept. 30 were $2.56 billion, up from $2.41 billion for the 1987 period. Net income amounted to $293.6 million compared to $218.4 million the year before.

Stuart E. Berlin: The only Government employee indicted, he headed the ship systems engineering branch of the Naval Air Systems Command from October 1986 until he was reassigned by the Pentagon last June. A Navy procurement specialist, he faces charges of accepting bribes in exchange for providing classified information. Court documents say Berlin provided information to Teledyne and Hazeltine.

William L. Parkin: An Alexandria, Va., consultant, he worked in the Navy's Joint Cruise Missile Project from 1977 to 1983. According to court papers released earlier, he was hired by Hazeltine to get inside information from the Pentagon that would allow the company to compete for a $15.9 million contract for battlefield equipment. The indictments said Teledyne agreed to pay the Parkin firm $160,000 to obtain information.

Fred H. Lackner: A Woodland Hills, Calif., consultant, he worked for several aerospace companies, including a Northrop Corporation electronic unit in Hawthorne Calif., the Stromberg Carlson Corporation in Winter Park, Fla., then a unit of the General Dynamics Corporation and later a division of the United Technologies Corporation, and the systems development unit of the Unisys Corporation. The indictment said Mr. Lackner and Mr. Berlin struck an agreement that Mr. Berlin would help Teledyne win a contract in exchange for money.

Joseph Colarusso: A former senior vice president of Hazeltine who worked at the Greenlawn office, he joined the company in 1959 and was appointed senior vice president in 1984. He resigned last month. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to defraud the Government and commit wire fraud.

Charles Furciniti: A former marketing representative of Hazeltine who held the title of vice president, he worked for the company for 20 years, resigning last May to take a post with another company. Like Mr. Colarusso, he pleased guilty to conspiracy to defraud the Government and commit wire fraud.

Michael Savaides: A Washington-based lobbyist for Teledyne, the Government said he had a financial relationship with Mr. Parkin. Affadavits showed that Mr. Parkin, Mr. Berlin and Mr. Savaides had planned at one time to divide $150,000 from Teledyne.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, there is precedent for this approach to combating defense fraud. Since 1981, inspector generals of agencies have been authorized to pay rewards to Government employees who save the taxpayers money by disclosing fraud, waste, or mismanagement. We recognized the importance of these rewards when we reauthorized this law during the 100th Congress.

We must encourage individuals with knowledge of fraudulent criminal conduct to step forward. This program, financed from the fines and penalties lawbreakers pay, will make it more likely that people will step forward and facilitate convictions in multimillion dollar fraud cases. The whistleblower incentive provision is necessary to ferret out corruption and insure a clean system of governmental procurement.

Last year this provision was included in the Major Fraud Act of 1988 reported by the Judiciary Committee. When it appeared that the provision would make timely consideration of the Major Fraud Act impossible, unfortunately this provisions was deleted. This year I look forward to it becoming law.

This bill also contains a technical amendment which is necessary due to an oversight last year. While considering the Major Fraud Act provision on allowable costs to contractors, we inadvertently retained a section of H.R. 3911 which was replaced by a later amendment. Though the Senate later passed a concurrent resolution to correct this mistake, the House did not act and the correction must still be made.

I urge my colleagues to join me in passing this legislation. It will measurably aid our effort to detect, punish, and deter major fraud schemes against the United States and the American taxpayers.

I am glad to inform my colleagues that Senator GRASSLEY is an original cosponsor of this bill. With his help, I hope to persuade the Congress to act promptly on the Major Fraud Act Amendments of 1989.●

By Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. PRESSLER):

S. 249. A bill to modify the provisions of law which provides a permanent appropriation for the compensation of Members of Congress, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

CONGRESSIONAL PAY FOR PERFORMANCE ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, September 30, 1988, marked a significant achievement for Congress—for the first time in 11 years Congress that day completed all 13 general appropriations bills before the end of the fiscal year. The last time Congress accomplished that was for fiscal year 1977.

Mr. President, when I talk with people back home, they simply do not understand why it is so difficult for us to do the job we were sent here to do. The record of Congress with respect to completing work on appropriation bills borders on being a disgrace. In the past 10 years, massive continuing resolutions have been the rule rather than the exception. That is one reason I have opposed increases in pay for Members of Congress.

Mr. President, now that Congress has demonstrated that our work can be completed on appropriations bills in a timely manner, I have decided that a little extra incentive is needed. That is why I am introducing the Congressional Pay for Performance Act. It is identical to the bill I introduced last year in the Senate [S. 2155] and that my good friend, Congressman Dan Lungren, introduced in the House [H.R. 1038].

Mr. President, the idea behind the bill is simple: If the Congress can't do its job of sending all major appropriations bills to the President before the end of the fiscal year, we should not be paid our salaries for that year through an automatic appropriation.

I suspect that few are aware that congressional salaries are not dependent on appropriations bills from year to year. In 1981, Congress passed a permanent appropriation for "Compensation of Members." That provisions is contained in Public Law 97-51. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the relevant section of that law be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, my bill has two parts. The first part amends the permanent appropriation for congressional salaries to provide that if Congress does not complete all major appropriation bills and send them to the President before the fiscal year begins, the automatic appropriation will not occur for that fiscal year.

The second part of the bill makes it out of order for the House or Senate to consider the legislative appropriations bill until all other general appropriations bills have been presented to the President for signature.

This bill is simply an effort to place on all of us in Congress the same realities that our constituents face in their jobs. The average Americans who fail to do their jobs year after year don't get paid—in fact they would probably be fired. On the other hand, when Members of Congress fail to complete their required work year after year, not only do they not get fired, in many instances they get automatic pay increases.

Mr. President, this bill is not aimed at pay raises. It does not cut anything, and it is not intended to make light of Members of Congress for feeling they should have reasonable salaries. It is merely an attempt to create a real incentive for Congress to do the business of passing appropriation bills on time.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this legislation to demonstrate to the American people that we are serious about what is described in political oratory back home as "doing the people's business."

PUBLIC LAW 97-51—OCT. 1, 1981

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 250. A bill to direct the Federal Communications Commission to proscribe all obscene and indecent material transmitted by means of intrastate telephone communications by amending section 223 of the Communications Act of 1934; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

INTRASTATE DIAL-A-PORN ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I'm pleased to introduce legislation which will put the final nail in the coffin of the dial-a-porn industry. Specifically, this bill would subject the purveyors of intrastate dial-a-porn to the same penalties now imposed on those who send pornographic telephone messages in the District of Columbia, in foreign communications, and across State lines.

Mr. President, as we showed with earlier dial-a-porn legislation, the Federal Government has been given clear responsibility for regulating the airwaves of our Nation. For 50 years our Government has had the power to eliminate all obscene material transmitted by television and radio. It is apparent from the history of the law that Congress created the statute to protect the people of this country from those who would expose them to the horrors of pornography.

Mr. President, I agree with the principles which clearly inspired the original antipornography legislation back in 1934. I am referring to the Communications Act. This body has been given the responsibility of protecting the moral and intellectual bedrock upon which this country was founded. The Senate reaffirmed those moral precepts in December 1987 by applying the same laws which govern radio and television to interstate telephone calls.

Mr. President, until last April, the dial-a-porn industry ran wild. Some experts predicted that the phone company profits generated by this pornographic "service" reached $54 million annually, a little less than one-third of the revenues generated by the dial-it services. But, Mr. President, while the dial-a-porn operations and the telephone companies were raking in the profits, countless lives were being destroyed.

Mr. President, I wish every Member of this body could witness the human tragedies I have seen through the testimonials of those ravaged by dial-a-porn. Unfortunately, the litany of wrecked lives goes on. In Alaska recently, a 12-year-old boy, babysitting two 3-year-old infants, made one dial-a-porn call. After hearing that one repulsive message, he walked up the stairs and began recreating what he had heard. The victims were those same 3-year-old babies.

In December 1988, we responded to the pleas of families like those in Alaska. By a vote of 98 to 0, the Senate voted to ban all interstate dial-a-porn. After much delay, the House passed the same restriction on interstate dial-a-porn. President Reagan signed the bill eliminating this practice on April 28.

Despite our victory, Mr. President, we didn't finish the job. Under current law, pornographic phone services operate without fear of Federal penalties, as long as their calls don't go beyond the State line. If the pornographers use the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, they should be stopped, whether they send their despicable messages across State borders or not. As long as the pornographers have access to the public phone lines, our children will continue to fall prey to this garbage.

The bill would end this travesty. It must, Mr. President. It is estimated that between 300 and 400 dial-a-porn "services" continue to exist because they operate solely within State borders.

Let's take a closer look at examples of what intrastate dial-a-porn has done, Mr. President.

In Arizona, the dial-it operation is called, "scoopline." This outfit offers a range of special phone lines. Most are the average weather or sports information services. But "scoopline" also has another feature, sexually oriented conversations. As a result of this type of entertainment, one 12-year-old boy was charged with two felonies.

Mr. President, this particular youngster, a junior high student, ran up more than $700 in "scoopline" charges. Most of his calls went to the line known as "Dial Cindy." "Cindy" offered the young man live conversation, with special instructions on how to show off to the girls at his school. He followed Cindy's advice. He wrote a girl in his school a pornographic message and attached a classmate's name to it. The young lady turned the message over to the school authorities and the boy was charged with forgery and providing obscene material to a minor.

Mr. President, according to the Arizona Republic, the boy's father told an investigating commission, "my son is a victim, my family is a victim." His son simply became one face in the sea of children who have acted out the words of the pornographic telephone message. We cannot begin to count the human cost.

Mr. President, in Plainsville, OH, a couple came home to find a 15-year-old neighbor running from their home. This boy had actually broken into their home just to use the local dial-a-porn service.

Mr. President, in Cleveland, a city councilwoman came home to find that she had a 40-page telephone bill with $3,200 in calls charged to her phone. She had used the phone for precinct business. Instead of business, the phone had become the vehicle for a community "sex hot line."

Mr. President, another nameless child tapped into a local dial-a-porn service. He was 16. Upon hearing the message, he proceeded to sexually abuse a 3-year-old little girl. Again Mr. President, we see the tragedy of intrastate dial-a-porn. How many families have to be torn apart by this filth?

When we tackled dial-a-porn during the last Congress, we encountered some loud opposition. We heard the siren cries of the ACLU gang. You know them, Mr. President. They are the ones who tell us that Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison intended our first amendment to protect these smut merchants and despoilers of youth. I may not be a lawyer, but I know enough law to realize that we have decades of Supreme Court decisions which give us the power to keep the dial-a-porn trash off our phone lines.

Mr. President, what kind of country is this? We allow the Government to regulate mud guards on trucks which travel on intrastate roads on the pretense that if affects interstate commerce. Yet we remain conspicuously silent about telephone calls which are made within one State.

Mr. President, we heard so much during the election year about the importance of the family. Everyone has a handout or a program to enhance the strength of America's families. Mr. President, I support efforts to strengthen the family. However, I don't believe that this strength can be resolved with some slick program or some catchy slogan. The viability of America's families and ultimately her greatness can be restored only by rebuilding the moral foundation upon which this country was founded. Without that foundation, we are no different from ancient Rome, and I believe we will face the same destruction.

Mr. President, removing pornography—in this instance dial-a-porn—from our society, particularly from our children—will help to rebuild our moral foundation, our families, and our country.

As I said at the outset, this legislation closes the last loophole in the telephone obscenity coffin. I urge my colleagues to act expeditiously on this important legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 223(b) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 223(b)) is amended in paragraphs (1)(A)(i) and (2)(A)(i) by inserting after "interstate" the following: ", intrastate,".

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 251. A bill to make a comprehensive investigation into potential changes to the global environment and climate, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT AND CLIMATE CHANGE ASSESSMENT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Global Climate Change Assessment Act of 1989. This bill addresses a situation of potentially staggering proportion—possible changes to the worldwide climate as a direct result of human activity. It has been called the largest uncontrolled scientific experiment in the history of mankind.

One of the many difficulties we will have in dealing with this possibility, or rather probability, for indeed it is that, is its long-term nature. We must look far into the future, both for manifestations of the problem, and solutions to it.

Fortunately, we have some experience with this type of question, and in an area of substantial similarity. I speak of acid rain. In 1980 the Congress adopted the text of my bill, S. 1794, the Acid Precipitation Act of 1980, as part of Public Law 96-294, the Energy Security Act of 1980. At that time this legislation was, as it still is today, the only acid rain legislation ever enacted at the Federal level.

This bill established the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program, or NAPAP as we have come to call it, which was assigned to undertake an exhaustive 10-year investigation into the causes and effects of acid rain. We are now in the ninth year of this program. Although NAPAP has not been without its problems, of effectiveness in the early years, and later of credibility, most all will agree that it has produced an abundance of respected research. In 1988 alone, more than 400 research papers were published under NAPAP auspices. We know a great deal more than we did in 1980.

The poorly understood phenomenon that was acidic deposition in 1979 and 1980 has much in common with today's looming environmental quandary of global climate change. Both are geographically extensive and cross international boundaries. Both occur over long periods of time and involve responses of natural systems with a reaction time measured in decades. Both involve interactions between numerous scientific disciplines. To come up with an effective response to either, we must understand the processes governing a highly complicated set of natural systems. And a coordinated national investigation of either must by necessity involve a number of existing Federal agencies, from NASA to the State Department.

The model we have in NAPAP is a valid one, and would be well applied to understanding global climate change. Clearly improvements are warranted, and many are incorporated into this bill. First and foremost, for research to be useful, it must be credible. This has been my primary concern. The criticism that NAPA received for its flawed interim assessment in 1987 was in large part justified, and we must prevent a similar fate from befalling this new effort. NAPAP's failure was of a political nature, and this can be prevented.

In late 1988, the Chairmen of the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering, and the Institute of Medicine sent a report to President-elect Bush, entitled "Global Environmental Change," that recommended a course of action. In the letter accompanying this report, these respected scientists stated that:

* * * a focal point for the deployment of national resources to address the issue [of global climate change] needs to be established to coordinate the diverse activities related to the problem. Such activities underway in the government are often poorly coordinated and insufficiently focussed on the necessary linkages between scientific understanding and policy options.

Improved predictions of the future course of the global environment require new and innovative approaches to studying the earth and its environment. A substantial investment in research and ground- and space-based monitoring activities is needed.

Mr. President, I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The bill I am introducing today would do much of what these experts have said we should do. My approach follows the model of NAPAP, and creates an interagency task force to coordinate all ongoing work—exactly such a "focal point for the deployment of national resources." By making this an interagency effort, we gain the expertise of all member agencies, and, if things work well, the bias of none. Were such a coordinating function given to any one agency, the findings of such an effort will bear the indelible mark of that agency, and will be open to greater dispute from other agencies, industry, and the public.

I must stress also what this bill is not. It is not a complete response to the threat of global warming. This task force will address only matters of investigation and interpretation of research results. It will tell us what is happening, and what the outcome of some response strategies might be. Although such information is elementally necessary, it is not the whole story. Far from it.

There is much information already available, and there are things to be done now to keep a bad situation from becoming far worse. My bill is not intended to discourage such action. Many Members of this body, most notably our beloved former colleague, Senator Stafford, as well as Senators CHAFEE, WIRTH, PELL, GORE, HOLLINGS, and others have proposed to do something about global warming now. I do not wish in any way to compete with or prejudice these efforts. Rather, this bill would add another dimension to them, that of a coordinated and sustained effort by the scientific community to help us make the decisions we will have to make.

No matter what our response is, we need knowledge. And reliable data. I quote Sir Joseph Stamp, the first Baron of Stamp and onetime Director of the Bank of England, who clearly understood the importance of good data collection:

Public agencies are very keen on amassing statistics—they collect them, add them, raise them to the nth power, take their cube root and prepare wonderful diagrams. But what you must never forget is that every one of those figures comes in the first instance from the village watchman, who just puts down what he damn pleases.

Some may use my proposal as an argument for postponement of action. Senators should know that this is not my view. Knowledge should help us respond, not prevent response.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES,
NATIONAL ACADEMY OF ENGINEERING, INSTITUTE OF MEDICINE,
Washington, DC.

The Honorable GEORGE BUSH,
The President-Elect of the United States, Old Executive Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT-ELECT: The problem of global environmental change is now widely recognized as one of growing urgency that will require responses by your Administration. Our views on the problem and possible responses are attached.

Embedded in the diverse manifestations of this problem—global warming, ozone depletion, tropical deforestation, and acid deposition—are enormous challenges to science and engineering, to your Administration, and to the world community of nations. In many instances, data and analyses are incomplete and long-term effects remain indeterminate; in addition, there are costs to the economy embedded in any decisions made to address the problem. Yet, even with a continuing background of uncertainty, it is important to recognize that human activities are indeed changing the global environment. Prudent courses of action need to be initiated now to try to understand and predict these changes, and to move toward suitable policy responses.

As outlined in the paper that follows, we suggest three principal actions that your Administration can take against the possibility that we may be conducting an irreversible experiment with our planet.

First, the issue of global environmental change must be made more prominent in the scientific, political, and foreign policy agendas of the United States. While the issue has been given more emphasis in the past several months, the need now is for sustained and systematic attention to economic and environmental policies bearing on global change.

Second, a focal point for the deployment of national resources to address the issue needs to be established to coordinate the diverse activities related to the problem. Such activities under way within the government are often poorly coordinated and insufficiently focused on the necessary linkages between scientific understanding and policy options. Further, policies must be such that they enchance the resiliency, robustness, and range of options of the affected sectors, from energy production to agriculture to coastal development.

Third, specific actions should be taken by your Administration to address those aspects of the problem that are reasonably well understood. Thus, we suggest that you consider the following findings and responses:

Both global warming and acid deposition are linked to heavy reliance on fossil fuels. Therefore, efforts to enhance both energy efficiency and conservation should be strengthened; means for increasing the use of the "cleanest" fossil fuels, such as natural gas, should be considered, but in the context of appraising their finite availability; and alternative non-fossil fuel energy sources, such as nuclear reactors and solar energy, need to be reappraised with more emphasis put on their use in a safe and publicly acceptable manner.

The Montreal Protocol is an important first step toward controlling stratospheric ozone depletion. However, provisions in the Protocol should be called upon to encourage deeper reductions in emissions of ozone-destroying chemicals with a total phaseout of chlorofluorocarbon products on a reasonable time scale.

Global warming will effect sea levels, agricultural systems, forestry, and water resources. It is not too soon to assess possible impacts and responses.

Tropical forests are being cut down at an alarming rate. Mitigating strategies that consider the economic and other forces driving this destruction need to be implemented in collaboration with the affected nations.

Improved predictions of the future course of the global environment require new and innovative approaches to studying the earth and its environment. A substantial investment in research and ground- and space-based monitoring activities is needed.

This is a broad agenda, and a challenging one. However, we believe that it offers a sensible approach to problems that urgently require presidential leadership and whose consequences, if realized, could be severe for all nations. Leadership by the United States could be a powerful force for uniting the nations of the world in a common endeavor vitally important to all.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK PRESS,
President, National Academy of Sciences.
ROBERT M. WHITE,
President, National Academy of Engineering.
SAMUEL O. THIER,
President, Institute of Medicine.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 251

Be it enacted in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Global Environment and Climate Change Assessment Act of 1989".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) mounting evidence gained from scientific observation indicates that significant changes in climatic and other environmental conditions may be occurring, and are likely to increase in the future;

(2) many of these predicted changes would profoundly affect regional and global ecosystems, and disrupt current patterns of human habitation, agriculture, energy use, transportation and public health, as well as international economic relationships;

(3) human activities, including the use of non-renewable energy sources and other natural resources, waste disposal practices, and the use of manufactured chemicals in agriculture, industry, transportation and consumer products appear to be significant contributors to the observed and predicted changes in climate and other environmental conditions;

(4) modifications in energy use, agriculture, industry, transportation and habitation patterns may be needed to prevent or mitigate the causes of global environmental and climate changes, and to accommodate the effects of such changes that are not prevented;

(5) as the world's leading consumer of energy and manufactured goods, the United States has a special responsibility to adopt a leadership position on the research and assessment required to understand the causes and effect of global environmental change, and the potential for preventing or mitigating such change;

(6) substantial progress has been made in the identification of some particular changes to the global environment, and these findings have helped to initiate international action to combat such changes;

(7) existing federal research programs into global environmental and climate change are too small and unsufficiently coordinated given the magnitude of possible consequences of predicted changes in the global climate;

(8) a long term global climate and environment research and assessment program is needed to achieve an understanding of the possible causes and effects of global environmental change, and to evaluate the mitigation measures available to reduce both the causes and effect of such change;

(9) the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program established in 1980 by Public Law 96-294 provides an instructive example for the establishment and functioning of such an interagency effort;

(10) NAPAP has been largely successful in commissioning research into the phenomenon of acid precipitation, although its efforts at assessing the significance of such findings were poorly handled at times resulting in reduced credibility; and

(11) a strict mandate from the Congress on how such an interagency task force on global environmental change should operate can do much to avoid the assessment-related problems that previously hampered the ability of NAPAP to provide credible evaluations of the acid precipitation phenomenon.

(b) In accordance with subsection (a), the Congress declares that such a global environment and climate change research and assessment program should be created, and that this program should have the following characteristics:

(1) a long term commitment to data gathering, research and assessment;

(2) close coordination among those federal agencies having a direct research and assessment role as well as those agencies whose programs will be affected indirectly;

(3) scientific, technological and economic components;

(4) committed funding of exploratory research and alternative studies of data available to supplement the mission-oriented research elements of the program;

(5) frequent peer review of both research and assessment efforts;

(6) participation of all institutions with an interest in the program, including universities, research institutes, other governments and non-governmental organizations;

(7) a comprehensive plan for research and assessment developed at the outset of the program and updated periodically;

(8) frequent reporting of research results to the Congress, the President, the scientific community and the public;

(9) creation of a data archiving system to assure broad access to information being developed in the program; and

(10) the formation of an interagency task force to oversee program management and coordinate activities undertaken by each cooperating agency.

INTERAGENCY TASK FORCE

(b) In preparing the research plan, the task force shall consider the following as its primary purpose: the research and assessment program to be undertaken in accordance with this Act shall provide the Congress, the President, and the public with the most accurate possible understanding of the causes and effects of global environmental and climate change, the probability that such change will occur, and to what extent, and information necessary to make the best informed judgments about how to respond to such changes, including specific evaluations of the probable effects on the global environment and climate of various response strategies.

(c) The research plan shall—

(1) be submitted in draft form to the Congress, and for public review, within 240 days of the date of the enactment of this Act;

(2) be available for public comment for a period of sixty days after its submission in draft form;

(3) be submitted in final form, incorporating such needed revisions as arise from comments received during the review period and additional work undertaken by the task force during and after the comment period, to the President and the Congress within sixty days of the close of the period allowed for public comment; and

(4) constitute the basis on which requests for authorizations and appropriations are to be made for the nine fiscal years following the fiscal year in which the research plan is submitted in final form.

(d) The research plan shall, at a minimum, include programs to—

(1) assure the establishment and operation of a widespread long-term monitoring network to measure parameters of the atmosphere, geosphere and biosphere;

(2) research atmospheric physics and chemistry to facilitate understanding of the processes by which the atmosphere interacts with emissions that may cause global climate change;

(3) develop and apply atmospheric models to enable prediction of long-range transport and fate of substances affecting the earth's atmosphere, oceans and biosphere, and predict future behavior of the atmosphere;

(4) research the role that the biosphere and the oceans have in the processes affecting the global climate;

(5) research and analyze all possible causes, both natural and anthropogenic, for any observed or predicted changes in global climate;

(6) make predictions based on available data regarding the degree to which global change may occur, and what the effects of such change may be on industry, agriculture, transportation and patterns of human behavior and habitation;

(7) identify the regions of the world likely to be affected by changes in the global environment and climate;

(8) assess the economic impact of changes in global climate on biota in general, crops, forests, fisheries, industry, transportation, consumer products, world economic relationships and recreational and aesthetic resources and structures;

(9) investigate the feasibility and economic costs of technologies that can be used to prevent changes in the global climate, or remedy or otherwise ameliorate the harmful effects on humans and the environment that may result from such changes;

(10) cooperate with research on changes in global climate being conducted in other sovereign nations having a commonality of interest, and by international organizations engaged in study of changes to the global climate;

(11) assess the probable outcome of various strategies that may be used to prevent or reduce changes in global climate, or ameliorate the effect of changes that do occur;

(e) The Director shall—

(1) obtain from each agency that is a member of the task force a comprehensive description of all programs being undertaken or planned by such agency relating to research into global climate change, including detailed funding and personnel breakdowns and a detailed statement of the goals of such research as it relates to the goals of this Act;

(2) in the case of an agency program that forms a logical and necessary part of the coordinated research and assessment to be undertaken by the task force, certify such program as part of the task force's interagency global climate change research and assessment effort; and

(3) in the case of an agency program found to be duplicative of other research, inefficient, or poorly coordinated with the research plan, certify that such program is not part of the task force's interagency global climate change research and assessment effort.

(f) The research plan shall describe the form in which the task force will present its findings to the Congress, the President and the public in the various reports issued during the ten-year program, with special emphasis being given to—

(1) findings presented in a manner to be of maximum utility for making decisions on how society in general, and government in particular should respond to changes in global climate; and

(2) appraisals of the confidence the scientific community as a whole has in any particular finding or prediction, and the degree to which there is disagreement on the validity or meaning of such findings or predictions.

(g) In the case where research or assessment deemed necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act is not being undertaken, the task force shall commission and fund such research, or assure that such research is commissioned or funded by others, including the members of the task force.

(h) The research plan shall include specific provisions to provide for the National Science Foundation to have organizational, management and oversight authority over a program to conduct small scale exploratory and interpretive research into changes into the process, effects and consequences of global climate change, including explorations of possible alternative interpretation of data gathered through other parts of the task force's research program.

(i) The task force shall update the research plan as necessary to reflect the changing understanding of changes to the global climate and the consequences thereof.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TEN-YEAR PROGRAM

SEC. 5. (a) The research plan shall be carried out by the task force in accordance with the provisions of this Act in the nine fiscal years following the year in which the research plan is issued in final form.

(b) The task force shall publish various research reports, which shall not attempt to make final or conclusive assessments regarding the significance of task force findings, but rather shall be a means for the task force to provide a description of activities and findings of the program, as follows:

(1) no later than 2 years after the date of enactment of this Act, and each year thereafter for the next seven years, the task force shall submit to the Congress a report describing the research activities and findings of the previous year; and

(2) no later than 9 years after the date of enactment of this Act, the task force shall publish a comprehensive research report that compiles all of the research findings of the task force for the life of the program.

(c) The task force shall publish three major assessment documents that shall integrate and assess the importance of the research findings available at the time of publication of such reports in accordance with section 4, as follows:

(1) the First Comprehensive Assessment shall be published no later than two years after the date of enactment of this Act, and shall be based in large part on research findings that pre-date the establishment of this program;

(2) the Second Comprehensive Assessment shall be published no later than five years after the date of enactment of this Act, and shall update the assessments made in the First Comprehensive Assessment, and make new assessments not contained in the First Comprehensive Assessment as warranted by new or altered understanding of the causes, nature or consequences of changes to the global climate; and

(3) the Final Comprehensive Assessment shall be published no later than ten years after the date of enactment of this Act, and shall update the assessments contained in the previous Comprehensive Assessments and make new assessments as necessary.

(d) Each of the Comprehensive Assessments issued under subsection (c) shall—

(1) be a complete reporting of all conclusions reached by the task force up to the point of publication regarding the causes, nature and consequences of changes to the global climate; and

(2) assess the probable outcome of various strategies that may be used to prevent or reduce changes in global climate, or ameliorate the effect of changes that do occur.

(e) To the degree that such are compatible with the existing international structure of investigation into changes in the global climate, the task force shall convene or sponsor an international conference to study and discuss the findings contained in each of the Comprehensive Assessments no later than 18 months after the date of publication of such Comprehensive Assessment.

OTHER PROVISIONS

SEC. 6. (a) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to grant any new regulatory authority or to limit, expand, or modify any regulatory authority under existing law, or to establish new criteria, standards, or requirements for regulation under existing law.

(b) The National Academy of Sciences is requested to convene a Scientific Advisory Committee to oversee the work of the task force. In particular, the Academy should—

(1) evaluate the overall structure of the task force's research plan, with particular emphasis given to whether the task force will address the key uncertainties that must be resolved for the President and the Congress to have an adequate understanding of changes to the global climate to make the best decisions in response to such changes in climate;

(2) evaluate the system adopted by the task force to assure that research undertaken by the task force or its member agencies undergoes proper peer review, and the implementation of such system; and

(3) make recommendations to the task force based on the evaluations it had made pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2) as it deems necessary.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 7. (a) For the purpose of establishing the task force and its offices and personnel, and developing the research plan, there are authorized to be appropriated to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration the sum of $7,000,000, to remain available until expended.

(b) For the purposes of carrying out the other provisions of this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration the sum of $100 million for the nine fiscal years beginning in the fiscal year in which the research plan is published in final form such that, notwithstanding subsection 3(f) of this Act, or any other provision of law, the expenditure of funds appropriated pursuant to this subsection shall be upon approval of the joint chairs of the task force.

(c) Appropriations made pursuant to subsection (b) shall not be available for expenditure by a member of the task force to carry out any program not certified to be consistent with the research plan pursuant to subsection 4(d) of this Act, and such appropriations shall not be available for expenditure on any program certified to be consistent with the research plan under subsection 4(d) without the approval of the joint chairs.●

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 252. A bill to discourage employers from closing sites on employment in the United States and relocating overseas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

SAVE AMERICAN JOBS ACT

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise to introduce S. 252, a bill to help save American jobs. The legislation will cut off Federal grants and loans to companies that move their operations—and American jobs—out of the country, companies that stay put—and keep Americans working—will be given preference when Federal contracts are awarded.

Each year the Federal Government hands out billions of dollars in guaranteed loans, grants, and contracts to businesses. But I say the Federal Government has no business giving our tax dollars to companies that turn their backs on American workers.

Last year Congress recognized that action was needed to assist workers and communities who were left in the lurch when employers closed their businesses with little or no advance notice. Congress overwhelmingly approved the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act so that now workers and communities will receive 2 months' advance notice of plant closings and mass layoffs.

We have all seen the devastating impact of plant closings on workers and communities. But it is a slap in the face to American workers when companies close their doors to take advantage of workers overseas who are willing to work, or are forced to work, for a fraction of the wages paid here. Mr. President, American companies that desert this country should not be rewarded with Federal tax dollars.

But that is precisely what has been happening in recent years. American firms have invested $2 billion in the last decade on assembly plants in Mexico alone. American companies are deserting American workers and moving not only to Mexico, but to Taiwan, to Korea, to Singapore, and elsewhere.

Some of the companies most guilty of exporting American jobs are among the top recipients of Federal contract dollars. While we may not be able to prevent companies from engaging in these disgraceful business practices, we certainly don't need to encourage them. We don't have to give companies millions of dollars in lucrative defense contracts, low-cost Export-Import Bank loans, or research and development grants. These companies must understand that when they shut the door on American workers, Uncle Sam is going to close his wallet to them.

The Save American Jobs Act requires companies to notify the Secretary of Labor at least 120 days before relocating a facility or an operating unit to a foreign country. The Secretary will compile a list of such companies every 6 months, and distribute the list to all Federal agencies.

Companies that appear on the list will be ineligible for any direct or indirect Federal grant or guaranteed loan for 5 years after the list is published. Exceptions may be made if failure to provide the grant or loan would threaten national security, cause a substantial job loss in the United States, or harm the environment.

Finally, the bill directs Federal agencies to give preference when awarding Federal contracts to those U.S. employers that retain operations in this country. American companies that employ American workers should be the companies that reap the benefits of American tax dollars.

Mr. President, the save American jobs bill is fair and equitable legislation. It provides a sensible solution to a pressing problem. I urge my colleagues to support it.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 252

By Mr. BINGAMAN (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KERRY, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COHEN, Mr. PELL, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. BRADLEY):

S. 253. A bill to establish a coordinated National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Program, and a comprehensive plan for the assessment of the nutritional and dietary status of the U.S. population and the nutritional quality of food consumed in the United States, with the provision for the conduct of scientific research and development in support of such program and plan.

NATIONAL NUTRITION MONITORING AND RELATED RESEARCH

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, as I have done in the past three Congresses, I rise to introduce legislation that would greatly enhance the Federal Government's ability to collect and disseminate information concerning the nutritional quality of the food we eat. I believe this legislation, the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act, is crucial to the health and well-being of all Americans.

Joining me as original cosponsors of this important bill are Senators LEAHY, BOSCHWITZ, SIMON, KERRY, HARKIN, CONRAD, COHEN, PELL, MOYNIHAN, HEINZ, BURDICK, ROCKEFELLER, CHAFEE, CRANSTON, and BRADLEY. Identical legislation will be introduced later this week in the House by Representatives BROWN and WALGREN.

With the support of these distinguished colleagues and others, both the House and the Senate overwhelmingly passed legislation identical to this bill last year. Unfortunately, that measure was vetoed by President Reagan on election day, 1988.

The President's veto, which is contrary to Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's recent recommendation that a national nutrition surveillance system be created, does a serious disservice to the American people. I believe firmly that a national system capable of providing up-to-date information is essential to the formulation of sound public policies and the development of effective nutrition education, nutrition research, and nutrition intervention programs.

With his veto, Mr. Reagan sent a message that he disagrees. Instead, he said that the creation of a coordinated Federal nutrition monitoring system would hinder Federal nutrition-related functions. Such a statement is difficult to support, however, in light of extensive House and Senate testimony which revealed that current national efforts to collect, analyze, interpret, and disseminate dietary and nutritional status data are often uncoordinated and untimely. Further testimony revealed that while improvements in coordination of nutrition monitoring efforts have been made in recent years, many Federal efforts lack adequate accountability, use imprecise or nonstandardized assessment methodologies, fail to give adequate attention to high-risk groups and geographic areas, and fail to use available resources effectively. Because of these deficiencies, we know little about the current nutritional and dietary needs of the people of this country.

The legislation I am introducing today recognizes that we must streamline the administrative functions of Federal nutrition monitoring programs if we are to better understand the relationship between diet, nutrition, and health.

Title I of the act establishes a 10-year coordinated nutrition monitoring and research program that is to be the joint responsibility of the Secretaries of the Departments of Agriculture and Health and Human Services. An interagency board will help the Secretaries to develop a comprehensive plan for nutrition monitoring and to implement the program. The bill also stipulates that an administrator may be appointed to serve as a coordinator for the plan and program activities.

The 10-year comprehensive plan will serve both as a focal point for nutrition monitoring activities and as a means to identify national nutrition monitoring priorities. The coordinated program will build upon the 1981 Joint Implementation Plan for a Comprehensive National Nutrition Monitoring System, and will include, among other components:

A grants program to encourage and assist State and local monitoring initiatives;

An annual interagency budget for each fiscal year of the program;

A means to stimulate academic-industry-government partnerships to accomplish national nutrition monitoring needs and foster productive interaction; and

A biennial report, through contract with a nationally known scientific body, on the dietary, nutritional, and health-related status of the American people and the nutritional quality of our food supply.

Title II establishes an Advisory Council, to be appointed by the President and the Congress, that will provide scientific and technical advice on the development and implementation of the national nutrition monitoring program established under title I. The Council will also evaluate the effectiveness of the program.

Members of the Council will represent various geographic areas, the private sector, academia, scientific, and professional societies, agriculture, minority organizations, and public interest groups.

Title III stipulates that by January 1, 1991, the Secretaries are to publish a report, based on current scientific and medical knowledge, containing nutritional and dietary information and guidelines for the general public. Entitled "Dietary Guidelines for Americans," the report is to be updated at least every 5 years.

Title III also requires a public comment period before a Federal agency may issue certain dietary guidance if either Secretary finds the guidance inconsistent with the "Dietary Guidelines for Americans." Briefly, after a 60-day period during which the Secretaries are to review internally the proposed regulations, if either Secretary—or both Secretaries—objects to the proposal, the proposing agency must publish a notice of comment in the Federal Register. After the expiration of a 30-day comment period, either Secretary may approve the guidance for dissemination to the public. The guidance must be accompanied by an explanation of its basis and purpose which addresses any substantive comments received.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today is the result of long and intensive negotiations spanning a number of years, and I am pleased to note that it is supported by a strong bipartisan coalition in the Congress and by a coalition of more than 70 organizations representing health, diet, agriculture, and commodity interests. These organizations include the American Heart Association, the American Dietetic Association, the National Grange, the National Cattlemen's Association, and the United Egg Producers. I request that a more complete list of supporters be included in the RECORD following my statement.

I will close by saying that the restructuring mandated in this legislation will ensure the effective use of Federal and State funds. It will help develop State and local initiatives to improve monitoring methods and standards. It will stimulate academic, industrial, and governmental partnerships.

And, most importantly, it will help ensure that the American public receives the most up to date and comprehensive dietary guidance possible so that healthful dietary decisions may be made. I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise today, at the beginning of the 101st Congress, to support the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act just introduced by my distinguished colleague from New Mexico, JEFF BINGAMAN.

As chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry, I share Senator BINGAMAN's concern that our present nutrition monitoring system does not adequately address the nutrition and health needs of Americans. I am very pleased to be an original sponsor of this important legislation.

Only 4 months ago, the Surgeon General of the United States released a major report to the President demonstrating the crucial interrelationships between diet and health. Included among the public policy recommendations proposed by the Surgeon General was the creation of a national nutrition surveillance system. This bill meets that important goal.

The Surgeon General's report carefully points out that the roots of many potentially fatal and debilitating diseases begin in childhood. Coronary heart disease, hardening of the arteries, high blood pressure, cancer, dental and skeletal diseases, anemia, and a host of other diseases have roots in childhood malnutrition. Some of this is related to poverty. However, much of it is caused by improper diet. The Nutrition Monitoring Act will provide Congress, and the public, with important information on the nutritional health of Americans—especially regarding vulnerable groups such as the elderly, pregnant women, infants, young children, and the homeless.

This bill was approved without objection by the Senate last year, and overwhelmingly approved by the House. It was supported by more than 100 organizations of all political persuasions, representing agricultural commodity groups, the food industry, farm organizations, health advocates, religious groups, and consumers.

It was vetoed by President Reagan on election day. Because Congress was out of session until the new Congress convened, there was no opportunity to override his election day veto.

It is astonishing that the previous administration chose to reject such a broad-based effort to improve and enhance the activities of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Health and Human Services. This bill requires essential coordination and accountability within the nutrition monitoring and dietary guidance programs of these Departments.

The National Nutritional Monitoring and Related Research Act calls for a 10-year scientific assessment to report on the health and well-being of Americans. These studies could provide a gold mine of information on the health and diets of Americans and on the quality of the American food supply.

Many questions are raised about the foods we eat and how to target assistance to those most at risk. Coordination of this information is not only essential for health assessment purposes, but makes good sense for program management purposes.

The bill will also make our Federal health and nutrition guidance consistent and understandable. All too often, conflicting or confusing information on the healthfulness of foods is provided by the Federal Government to consumers.

Title III is the result of a unique coalition of support from commodity and health organizations. This section requires that both the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Health and Human Services review dietary guidance to be listed by various Federal agencies to ensure that inaccurate and misleading information is not provided to consumers.

These provisions make it easier for American consumers to obtain reliable information from their Government on the nutritional values of foods they eat, and encourages the Federal Government to speak with one voice in issuing dietary guidance to Americans by coordinating efforts of all Federal agencies in releasing dietary information.

I am a strong believer in the American farmer's ability to provide high quality food at reasonable prices. Dietary guidance issued by the Federal Government should be fair to the agriculture community and accurate for the American public.

I am pleased to support this excellent piece of legislation, Mr. President. I hope that the kinder and gentler nature of our new administration will recognize the need to support these measures without further delay.

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have this opportunity to cosponsor and speak in favor of the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act of 1989. This bill will establish for the first time a coordinated and comprehensive program designed to collect and distribute information about the dietary and nutritional status of U.S. citizens and about the nutritional quality of food consumed in the United States.

The same nutrition monitoring bill that we are introducing today enjoyed broad public and industry support when it was considered and passed overwhelmingly by both Houses of Congress last year. The bill was supported by many of the most widely recognized nutrition, health, education, religious, and agricultural organizations in the country. The following groups were among the many supporting this bill: the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Cattlemen's Association, the National Pork Producers Council, the American Meat Institute, the American Dietetic Association, the American Heart Association, the American Association of Retired Persons, the American College of Preventive Medicine, the Food Research and Action Center, and Bread for the World. Regrettably, President Reagan waited until election day of last year and then vetoed the bill. I sincerely hope that the bill will move quickly through Congress and be promptly signed into law this year.

The bill establishes a coordinated 10-year National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Program to be implemented under the joint direction of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Nutrition monitoring and related research includes measuring, first, dietary, nutritional, and health status, second, food consumption, third, food composition, fourth, dietary knowledge and attitudes, and fifth, food supply and demand. To assist in implementing the coordinated program, the bill establishes an interagency board to be jointly chaired by representatives of the Departments of Agriculture and Health and Human Services. By coordinating the nutrition monitoring activities of Federal agencies in this way, the legislation streamlines agency functions and promotes efficiency in government operations.

This program holds great promise for improving the health of our citizens and reducing private and public health care costs through better diet and nutrition. The recent Surgeon General's report on nutrition and health concluded: "Impressive evidence already links nutrition to chronic disease. However, much more information is needed to continue to identify changes in the national diet that will lead to better health for the Nation. Gaps in our knowledge of nutrition suggest future research and surveillance needs."

One of the most important steps we can take to improve health through better nutrition is to learn more about what the American people are eating. The most current information about the nutritional status of Americans is found in a 1977 USDA food consumption survey. We all know that eating habits and nutrition have changed since that time, but we do not have accurate information on how they have changed.

The Secretaries are directed under the bill to contract with a scientific body to prepare and publish every 2 years, or more frequently if appropriate, a report on the dietary, nutritional, and health-related status of the people of the United States and the nutritional quality of food consumed in the United States. The bill requires special attention to studying and monitoring the status of those who are most likely to be at nutritional risk, such as the elderly, homeless, poor, and children.

The bill also, first, provides for developing uniform and cost-effective standards and indicators for assessing and monitoring nutritional and dietary status and relating food consumption patterns to health; second, establishes a grants program to encourage and assist State and local governments in developing nutrition monitoring programs; and third, directs cooperation among State, local, and Federal governments, the private sector, scientific communities, health professionals, and the public.

I am also very pleased that the bill is specifically crafted to promote consistency and soundness in dietary guidance and advice issued by Federal agencies. On too many occasions in the past the Federal Government has put out vague and contradictory guidelines on diet and nutrition causing unwarranted confusion and fear. As a result, the reputations of some of our most nutritious foods have been unnecessarily sullied. This bill reflects a welcome balance between the views of consumer and nutrition groups and those of agriculture and commodity groups.

The Secretaries of Agriculture and Health and Human Services are required to publish a report by January 1, 1990, and at least as often as every 5 years thereafter, a report containing dietary guidelines for Americans. Each of these reports is to contain nutritional and dietary information and guidelines for the general public. In addition, any dietary guidelines to be issued by any Federal agency must be submitted to both Secretaries for review before release. If both Secretaries disapprove of the proposed dietary guidelines, they will not be released. If only one of the Secretaries approves the proposed guidelines, they may be released, but only after allowing the public to submit comments on the proposed dietary guidelines.

The bill also establishes a National Nutrition Monitoring Advisory Council to be appointed by the President and Congress. The council is required to have members representing various geographic areas, the private sector, academia, scientific and professional societies, agriculture, minority organizations, and public interest organizations.

Mr. President, this is a modest measure that will address serious issues involving the nutrition and health of our Nation's population. I urge that it be quickly considered and passed.●

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 254. A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to establish fair competition between the private sector and Federal Prison Industries; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL PRISON INDUSTRIES REFORM ACT

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am offering legislation to reform the Federal Prison Industries, also known as UNICOR, by amending the statute which allows prisons to borrow money from the U.S. Treasury and receive a preference when selling prison-made products to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, Federal Prison Industries is a very large corporation. It is engaged in the business of making chairs, tables, desks, and other office products. It uses Federal prisoners to manufacture these items. It borrows money from the Government to finance its activities then sells the products to the Federal Government.

John Sloan, the president of the National Federation of Independent Business, points out in an statement on this subject, that what had originally started out as a teaching program for prisoners has now become a corporate giant. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Mr. Sloan's statement be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, what we have created is a Government-operated company which has a clear competitive edge over private companies. As Mr. Sloan observes, because of the preference given to it by the Congress, Prison Industries can even keep the Government from giving contracts to private manufacturers.

If that weren't enough, Mr. President, prison products need not even meet the same quality standards which are required of the private sector. This is a multimillion dollar industry making furniture that the Government must buy without adherence to the high-quality expected of products purchased from the private producers.

Mr. President, Prison Industries legislation had a strange history during the last Congress. The bill giving Prison Industries authority to borrow money was defeated in the House when it was brought up on the Suspension Calendar on September 14, 1988. Yet, Mr. President, when this legislation was introduced last year, the House had a half day of limited hearings and the Senate had none.

Mr. President, let us get rid of the preference which Prison Industries receive in securing Government contracts. In other words, Federal Prison Industries get a special Government benefit at the expense of a lot of hard-working people across the country. That does not make sense.

When borrowing authority is extended, small businesses across the country could be destroyed. Prisons hold a clear advantage over any business they care to compete with because they receive preference on all Government contracts they choose to bid on. That is to say prisons are given a right of first refusal.

Mr. President, as I said earlier this is not a small corporation. We are talking about an industry which claims sales of $316 million with a net worth of over $160 million. That was in fiscal year 1988. The Bureau of Prisons continues to add factories to its already enormous industrial plant. How many corporations can boast of a capacity like that?

I am not condemning prisoner training. But this corporation goes well beyond the intent of the original training program. My State produces one-quarter of the furniture in this country. Prison Industries are out there competing with North Carolina furniture and textile companies already under assault from foreign competition. Think about it, men and women in North Carolina and Michigan and South Carolina are being put out of work by an agency of their Government, the Federal Bureau of Prisons. This Senator will not sit by and let this happen.

This legislation institutes four simple reforms designed to bring some fairness to our domestic industries:

It sunsets the borrowing authority in 3 years which will allow us to study the effect this measure has had on business competing with Prison Industries.

It does away with the Prison Industries contract preference so that all of our businesses may compete for Federal contracts on an equal footing.

It requires Prison Industries to comply with GSA standards. The public should know that its tax dollars buy only the best products.

It requires the President to appoint a representative of the effected industries, the people who speak for the furniture and textile companies, to sit on the Board of Directors. We need to make sure that Prison Industries do not undercut the private sector.

Mr. President, I cannot emphasize how important these reforms are. This legislation has received the support of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Furniture Manufacturers Association, and the National Federation of Independent Business. They understand the illogic of having the Federal Prison System get special treatment in the marketplace. We cannot continue to penalize the hard-working, law-abiding people of our country. I urge Senators to support this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SMALL BUSINESS ANGLE

(By John Sloan)

MINORITY RULES, SMALL FIRMS SUFFER

Last month, in cleaning out tie closets, lawmakers swept some dirt onto the drug bill, increasing unfair government competition against private-sector companies.

Big, popular bills have always been targets for pet provisions, but this action is particularly maddening because the House defeated a similar measure, considered on its own merits, just a month earlier—by nearly 100 votes!

Undeterred by that margin, supporters inserted the same language into the drug bill, the final piece of legislation hustled through the 100th Congress. The measure allows Federal Prison Industries Inc., known as UNICOR, to borrow money from the federal treasury to expand. UNICOR uses federal prisoners to manufacture chairs, desks, parachutes, paint brushes. Then, it sells the goods to federal, state and local governments.

The original intent of the corporation was to teach prisoners marketable skills, but with $250 million in sales in 1986, members of the House realized that UNICOR had changed from teacher to business executive.

The amendment that allows UNICOR to bank with the federal treasury, tightens the grip that this government-supported company has over federal procurement. Prison Industries' built-in advantages, such as the use of government buildings and cheap labor, give it a hefty competitive edge. The bidding process further stacks the deck.

UNICOR has the first shot at federal contracts. Its bids do not have to be the lowest, and it is exempt from the government standards that private firms must follow. The clincher, Prison Industries even can keep the government from offering contracts to private companies!

Continuing budget resolutions, the usual magnet for these dust balls, didn't surface this year, because Congress passed separate appropriations bills. Omnibus bills like the drug bill are the next best thing to a continuing resolution. Safety tucked away in a bill better measured in pounds than pages, no one discovers the mischief until it becomes law.

The National Federation of Independent Business, the nation's largest advocacy organization for small business, opposes this expansion of unfair government competition, which favors government-run industries over taxpaying small businesses.

Legislators let their guard down and let down their small-business constituents. But it is difficult for even the most vigilant legislator to review these gigantic bills before a vote.

The 100th Congress proved that it could kick the continuing resolution habit. Let us hope the 101st Congress pares omnibus bills to manageable pieces and cleans them up in the process.

Let us also hope that undoing the damage of UNICOR will be high on the priority list for the next Congress.

(John Sloan is President of the National Federation of Independent Business, representing more than half a million small-business men and women.)

S. 255. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Local Rail Service Assistance Program; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

LOCAL RAIL SERVICE ASSISTANCE REAUTHORIZATION

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senators EXON, PRESSLER, BURDICK, COCHRAN, ROCKEFELLER, SIMON, BUMPERS, GRASSLEY, and D'AMATO, I am introducing a bill to reauthorize the Local Rail Service Assistance Act which expired on September 30.

The Local Rail Service Assistance Program has played a very important role in the rehabilitation of many of our Nation's branch lines since its creation in 1973.

Without railroad branch lines, farmers would have to move their grain by truck, a much more costly mode of shipment. The Iowa Grain and Feed Association estimates that it costs farmers 3 to 12 cents per bushel more when grain is shipped by truck instead of by rail. Small coal companies and many small manufacturers face the same problem. For many of them, the loss of rail service can mean the loss of their ability to operate economically.

In addition to the higher costs business would have to pay if branch lines are lost, Government would also pay higher costs, due to greater use of the highway system by trucks. For every 100 railroad cars filled with corn that we take out of commission, our deteriorating roads and highways will have to endure 387 more trucks.

Some say that railroads are not a Federal responsibility. They say that if a rail line is not profitable it will be abandoned and if it is profitable, it will be maintained. That simply is not true. The real world is more complex. A railroad may make money on a line. But, it may not be making as much of a profit as it could make elsewhere. Or, a railroad may be in such poor financial shape that it cannot maintain its lines, allowing them to fall into disrepair and become more costly to use. Or, poor railroad management can leave shippers without cars, forcing them to use trucks which means there is less revenue earned on the branch line.

Economic systems are not perfect. The value of a branch line to local shippers may be so great that the shippers themselves may want to purchase the line if a railroad chooses to abandon it. But the shippers may not have the resources to put the deal together. The value of a line to grain elevators and farmers may be far more than the salvage value of the track and the land. But it is often difficult to get enough people together who recognize their long term interest who can afford to buy the line.

In addition to the interests of the parties directly involved, it is important to remember that the overall efficiency of our transportation system has a direct effect on our national competitiveness. The more it costs us to move our goods, the less competitive we are.

America's strong transportation system has been one of its greatest strengths. But, today, we see evidence all around us of highways and railroads that are poorly maintained or simply inadequate to meet the needs of commerce.

I believe that one of the most important steps our Nation has taken to stimulate the economy has been the establishment of first-class transportation systems. The Federal Government provided the incentives, mainly through grants of land, for the building of our major railroads in the last century. That investment has had a tremendous positive impact on our Nation's productivity.

But, in the last few decades, our railroads have been deteriorating. We have borne this cost as a nation. Debate about who is at fault for this development is not productive. The fact is, we do not have the Federal resources to create a massive program to restore all of the lines that should be saved. And this bill we are introducing today does not contemplate such an effort. But, I do believe that we can provide for a modest sum to be used to help preserve useful branch lines with significant traffic loads that would not remain viable without assistance. We can provide enough funds to help avoid the worst tragedies in this area.

The bill which we are introducing provides a modest $10 million in fiscal year 1989 and $25 million for the coming two fiscal years for the Local Rail Assistance Program. President Reagan's budget did contain a request for $10 million in a supplemental request for this program for fiscal year 1989. I am told that the American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials have identified a need for over $1 billion in almost every State. And recent events in the rail industry are likely to increase that need considerably. The funds being authorized by this legislation will find many worthy projects. With proper administration, these funds can be used to make the difference on a number of very significant lines where the loss of service would be most damaging.

This program is designed to give maximum flexibility to the States in the selection of the lines to be benefited and the structure of the assistance to be provided. Normally, the State applies to the Federal Railroad Administration with its most viable proposals and the FRA allocates the available funds to be administered by the State authorities.

In some cases, grants are provided. In others, low-interest loans are used. In my home State of Iowa, our State rail division has developed a program which provides for a considerable leveraging of the Federal funds with the State matching the Federal contribution and often acquiring a 60-percent match of the Government funds from the railroad or the shippers. In some cases, that is not feasible. When loans are issued, the repaid funds go back to the States to be used for new railroad assistance.

This is a program that really works. Lines are saved and our entire economy benefits. It deserves to be continued.●

S. 256. A bill to direct a study by the Secretary of Agriculture of the classification of anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas for purposes of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

RECLASSIFICATION OF ANHYDROUS AMMONIA

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, anhydrous ammonia is the major and most practical form of fertilizer for distributing nitrogen to crops. Farmers prefer to apply anhydrous ammonia directly to the soil because it is the most available and most cost-effective, nitrogen-content fertilizer. Anhydrous ammonia accounts for over half of the U.S. fertilizer supply and has been safely used by farmers for decades.

The Department of Transportation is considering the reclassification of anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas as part of an extensive proposed rulemaking to amend hazardous materials regulations. But such a reclassification is not, in our view, based on the evidence and suggests a lack of understanding of the impact that anhydrous ammonia has on American agriculture.

Last year, Secretary of Agriculture Lyng expressed his concern about the potential negative impact of this proposed rule on U.S. farmers and many other segments of the agricultural community. Secretary Lyng urged the Department to retain the present classification of this important plant nutrient. The National Association of Wheat Growers, the National Corn Growers Association, and other farm organizations are also opposed to the proposed reclassification.

If the proposed rule were to be finalized in its present form, it could generate excessively higher insurance rates, severely affect insurance availability, and cause transportation difficulties because of local restrictions. This would be particularly unfortunate given the fact that anhydrous ammonia simply does not qualify as a poisonous gas under the DOT or EPA proposed inhalation toxicity criteria.

Senators DIXON, COCHRAN, GRASSLEY, and I are introducing legislation today which requires the Department of Agriculture to study the effect that the proposed classification change would have on farmers and farm-related businesses. Congress would be given 180 days to consider the findings before the DOT could issue regulations reclassifying anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas.

Mr. President, I have been in touch with Senator EXON, who chairs the authorizing subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act. He is well aware of this issue and is working to assure that farmers and farm-related businesses are not adversely affected by the Department's proposed rulemaking in this area. I believe that passage of this measure can be an important step toward reaching that goal.●

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Department of Transportation's proposal to reclassify anhydrous ammonia has generated numerous concerns and problems for American farmers. Months have gone by, and these concerns and problems remain unanswered and unsolved. The reclassification question needs to be resolved—and it needs to be resolved with full knowledge and understanding of the ramifications it poses for American agriculture.

To that end, I join my good friend, Senator HARKIN, in introducing legislation designed to provide vital information regarding the impact of the reclassification of anhydrous ammonia. Our bill directs the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct a study examining the effect of this reclassification on farm income, crop production, insurance rates, export competitiveness, import costs, and our domestic markets.

Mr. President, anhydrous ammonia is an essential chemical for agriculture. The uncertainty surrounding the actual hazard presented by anhydrous ammonia is important in light of its economic importance to our struggling agriculture industry. Approximately 45 percent of all nitrogen fertilizer used by American farmers is applied as anhydrous ammonia. It is used widely because it is inexpensive. Spreading nitrogen with anhydrous ammonia is 50-percent cheaper than performing the same activity with other compounds.

The Department of Transportation's proposal to reclassify this compound as a poison is misguided and reckless, and disregards the consequences that it would inflict on American agriculture. Such a reclassification will drastically increase the cost of nitrogen fertilizer for the American farmer. Insurance costs for transporting the chemical would be prohibitive and it is also conceivable that, in some cases, insurance would become unavailable.

In addition, there is some question as to how anhydrous ammonia, if classified as a poison, could be transported to American farms. Furthermore, many foreign markets, which our farmers are already struggling to recapture, would be closed because of legal restrictions on foods treated with poisonous chemicals.

The reasoning behind the reclassification of anhydrous ammonia is to alert its users of the possible dangers inherent in the use of this product. That being the case, a more appropriate reclassification would be that of a corrosive product, rather than a poison.

Mr. President, our largest trading partner in anhydrous ammonia—Canada—identifies it in this manner. This type of classification serves to alert users of potential dangers while avoiding the negative economic impact that would result on our American farmers.

The Department of Transportation has been unable to resolve the reclassification issue. The legislation we are introducing today will provide essential information that will enable the Department to reach a sound and reasonable solution. I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise today to reaffirm my support of this important legislation that will address an issue of major concern to America's agricultural community. Early last year, the Department of Transportation proposed rules that would reclassify anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas.

It is well known that anhydrous ammonia is used for fertilizer all over America. It is a common substance that is handled by farmers everyday. At the time, Dick Lyng, the Secretary of Agriculture, expressed his opposition to this proposal.

Several of my Republican colleagues, including, Senators HELMS, BOSCHWITZ, BOND, MCCONNELL, KASSEBAUM, MCCLURE, PRESSLER, GRAMM, and I have previously expressed our opposition to this provision. Over 1,000 individuals and farm organizations concerned about the impact on agriculture and their individual operations have expressed opposition.

Mr. President, I believe there needs to be more investigation as to the effects that reclassifying anhydrous ammonia would have on agriculture. Several important areas need further study, including, the effects on farm income levels, crop production, insurance rates, export competitiveness, import costs, and domestic markets.

Mr. President, I believe that it is prudent to study these potential, disastrous effects on American agriculture before DOT pushes ahead with regulations. Farmers deserve more. Anhydrous ammonia is a necessary element in producing food for America.

As I understand it, this bill will provide a necessary window for study of these potential harmful affects. The Department of Agriculture should be heard from and the Nation's farmers should be heard from.

Mr. President, at this time, I ask a copy of a letter I sent to Secretary of Transportation Jim Burnley be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, we would be irresponsible to rush forward with regulations without this study. I urge my colleagues to support this action and participate in this needed investigation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, DC,
September 9, 1988.

HON. JAMES BURNLEY,
Secretary, Department of Transportation, Washington, DC.

DEAR JIM: Several of my Republican colleagues including Senators Karnes, Helms, Boschwitz, Bond, Cochran, Nickles, McConnell, Kassebaum, McClure, Pressler and Gramm and I, have written you regarding the Department's proposal to reclassify anhydrous ammonia. This is an important issue for all farm state legislators. Senator Karnes recently raised the issue with Governor Kerry in their first debate last Monday and I am concerned you may visit his state in the near future without having resolved this question.

The DOT proposal to reclassify anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas will have a major economic impact on people whose livelihoods depend on agriculture including wheat, corn and poultry producers and food processors. Major farm groups and representatives of agri-business interests are all opposed to this idea. In addition, both Houses of Congress have adopted report language urging DOT to drop the proposal. Although some have presented this as a purely technical transportation issue, it is clearly a matter of broad concern.

Secretary Lyng is on record opposing the DOT proposal and it is my understanding that over 1,000 public comments have been sent to DOT in opposition. It appears the proposal was intended to make the classification of this important fertilizer conform to United Nations standards, but it is certain such a proposal will have far reaching effects that are not in our best interests.

I am sure that my colleagues mentioned above would greatly appreciate and publicly support the Department dropping this proposal. Your personal attention to this matter would be welcomed and I would urge favorable action on behalf of American agriculture as soon as possible. Thank you for your assistance.

Sincerely,

BOB DOLE,
U.S. Senate.

S. 257. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to permit individuals to receive tax-free distributions from an individual retirement account or annuity to purchase their first home, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

FIRST-TIME HOMEBUYER OPPORTUNITY ACT

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the First-Time Homebuyers Opportunity Act, which I believe will bring homeownership within the reach of thousands of additional American families. The legislation I am introducing today will permit individuals to use funds in their individual retirement accounts [IRA's] for purchasing their first home.

The dream of owning a home has been a primary motivation for generations of American families. For most Americans, home ownership has been the only realistic way to build family assets and to provide a nest egg for their retirement years. I believe home ownership contributes enormously to the quality of our community life and the stability of our society.

Mr. President, I believe that it is in the national interest to ensure that home ownership is within the reach of all American families who want it and are willing to work for it.

Unfortunately, the country's recent performance on home ownership is not as good as it should be, or even as good as it has been in the past. Recent statistics tell us that our Nation's home ownership rate has been declining since 1980; that families are waiting longer and longer before they can purchase a home; and that more and more families buying their first homes are having to rely more heavily on a second income to make home ownership possible.

Mr. President, enactment of the First-Time Homebuyers Opportunity Act would provide important assistance to thousands of Americans who are still trying to buy their first home. The bill would permit individuals to withdraw funds from their individual retirement accounts or annuities without penalty if the funds are used to buy a principal residence within 90 days of the withdrawal.

The bill is designed to increase savings for home ownership and to provide the kind of assistance that is most important to first time home buyers. An individual could not withdraw funds under the bill unless they had invested in the IRA for at least 12 months. The total amount of home ownership withdrawals for each individual could not exceed $10,000 in the aggregate across all taxable years. For reasons of administrative feasibility, those who have not had an ownership interest in a principal residence for 3 years would be considered first time home buyers.

The bill places no new burden on the U.S. Treasury. Its effects would be to make investment in a first home a permitted form of IRA investment. Individuals already have wide latitude investing their IRA funds: stocks, bonds, real estate investment trusts, certificates of deposit, and other forms of financial assets. It is ironic that investment in a person's own home is not already a permitted form of investment since home ownership has long proven to be one of the best ways for Americans to build up assets for their retirement years.

In addition, the bill uses a proven incentive to save for home investment. It would give American first time home buyers help that has for many years been available to people in Germany, Canada, Japan, France, the United Kingdom, and other industrial nations.

Mr. President, I believe the bill I am introducing today provides a straightforward efficient way to enable many more Americans to share in the dream of home ownership. I believe the bill deserves prompt consideration in the Senate, and I invite my colleagues to cosponsor it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 258. A bill to amend the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 to extend the program of flood insurance for structures on land subject to imminent collapse or subsidence; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

NATIONAL FLOOD INSURANCE

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to amend the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968. This bill provides for a 3-year extension of section 1306(c) of the act. Identical legislation has been introduced in the House by Congressman WALTER B. JONES.

This provision was originally enacted in 1987 and authorizes advanced payments under a valid insurance contract for relocation or demolition of an erosion threatened structure.

This provision currently addresses a problem of continuing concern to those who live near numerous coastal areas which are subject to erosion and flooding. The area of particular concern in my State is the Great Lakes coastline. The lakes' short, choppy waves continuously erode the coastal areas, causing many parts of the shoreline to lose an average of 2 to 3 feet a year. Clearly this trend is a serious concern to homeowners who have built upon these erosion prone areas. Some residents on the lakes have had their homes completely washed out by storms.

If section 1306 expires homeowners on these coastal areas will be put in a difficult position. Many cannot independently afford to relocate their houses. They must wait helplessly for the homes to be destroyed at which point they will be eligible to collect insurance for damages. This bill provides an alternative. Homeowners who qualify for the Federal Flood Insurance Program [FFIP] will be allowed to make an advanced insurance claim for up to 40 percent of the value of their home provided they relocate it behind a 30- or 60-year erosion line.

This relocation program has numerous benefits for all parties involved. It offers homowners the opportunity to act positively rather than to resign themselves to the inevitable loss of their homes and property. Families save their homes and eliminate a potential hazardous structure from the community. The environment benefits when development activities are moved back from threatened shores, and when beaches are not littered with the debris from washed out structures.

The Government also benefits from the implementation of this program. Scientists believe shoreline erosion directly contributes to flood related damages. Since the Federal Government, through the Flood Insurance Program, is the principal insurer of high-hazard coastal structures, unchecked shoreline erosion is quietly increasing the American taxpayer's financial exposure.

Section 1306 allows us to reduce Government liability and long-term cost while maintaining Government responsibility. It reduces the amount of the claim by more than half since the cost of relocation is substantially below the cost of paying the full claim on a totally destroyed structure. Additionally, erosion setbacks will help to prevent repetitive claims. These two changes will reduce the long-term costs of the Flood Insurance Program.

This bill makes good environmental, consumer, and budgetary sense. It provides a reasonable solution to a serious erosion and flooding problem that is plaguing many States. Before the original implementation of this measure, the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] expressed concerns that implementation of this provision would result in a raid on the national flood insurance funds. They also worried that it would be difficult to technically administer this program. However, in the 18 months since implementation, there has been no raid on the funds. In fact only about 100 claims have been filed. The program's administration has not proven problematic either. Neither of the two potential problems of the measure has materialized and the program is progressing. A 3-year extension of this measure will allow for complete study and documentation of the benefits of this program, perhaps leading to a permanent addition to the National Flood Insurance Act.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 258

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1306(c) of the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 (42 U.S.C. 4013(c)) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), in the matter preceding subparagraph (A), by sriking "claim" and inserting "certification";

(2) in paragraph (4)(D), by inserting before the period at the end the following: ", or within an area 200 yards east of such area"; and

(3) in paragraph (7), by striking "September 30, 1989" and inserting "September 30, 1992".

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the reauthorization of flood insurance reforms initiated in the Housing and Community Development Act of 1987. My friend and colleague, Senator RIEGLE, was instrumental in the passage of these reforms in 1987. I am pleased to join him as we reauthorize these changes for an additional 3 years.

The Housing and Community Development Act of 1987 contained a provision to adjust the Federal Flood Insurance Program to assist homebuyers whose homes are threatened by flooding. Specifically, the program was altered to encourage homeowners, whose home faced destruction as a result of flooding, to move or destroy their homes before total collapse. Without this change, a homeowner was forced to sit by and watch flooding tear down a family home. A family was not allowed to take any preventative measures to avoid home destruction. If a family wanted to move its home after a vicious storm in hopes of avoiding the next, the option was not available. Needless to say, homeowners living in coastal areas were frustrated by policy before the 1987 act passed.

Not only was the old policy frustrating to homeowners, but it was also frustrating to local governments which had to pay heavy environmental clean-up costs when a house was destroyed by flooding. The 1987 act policy attempts to avoid destruction of a home or destroy a home in a manageable, less expensive manner.

As a Senator whose home area, Long Island, has been affected by flooding, I have been particularly interested in the flood insurance program changes. Ironically, these legislative changes may have an adverse impact on one unique community on Long Island, Westhampton Beach. Consequently, in the 1987 Housing and Community Development Act I included a provision to exempt part of this community from the programatic changes. I have continued to exempt this community from the 3-year reauthorization and I have further defined the exemption to include all affected homeowners in the Westhampton Beach area.

I am pleased to be a part of a bipartisan effort to protect homeowners in New York State and around the Nation from catastrophies associated with flooding. I thank my colleague, Senator RIEGLE, for his support and dedication to this worthy cause.

Thank you, Mr. President.

S. 259. A bill to provide a White House Conference on International Trade in Services; to the Committee on Finance.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN SERVICES ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce, together with my colleagues Senators ROTH and DODD, legislation to authorize a White House Conference on International Trade in Services.

The purpose of this bill is to provide the forum and prestige of a White House conference to address the critical issue of international negotiations on trade in services. At a time when the merchandise trade account is in deficit—$160 billion in 1987—the services account continues to generate a surplus. Services are vitally important to the American economy, generating an estimated 76 percent of employment in 1988 and 70 percent of our gross national product. Expansion of our services exports should be a major element of our national effort to bring our trade accounts back into equilibrium.

To set priorities and to generate information for this effort, my bill would convene a White House conference no more than 6 months after the passage of this legislation. A report, to be submitted to the President, would outline an agenda for negotiations and would create a statistical base to be used by our trade negotiators. The report would detail recommendations to our negotiators, and would generate a more accurate profile of the services sector of the U.S. economy.

The importance of the services sector has been highlighted by recent free trade agreements with Canada and Israel. The Canadian Free Trade Agreement is the first to set binding rules for international trade in services. Canada and the United States have agreed to provide national treatment, or equal treatment of foreign and domestic firms, for services trade in 150 industries. The free trade agreement with Israel signed in 1984 lays out basic trade principles for services.

These bilateral agreements are an important foundation for multilateral negotiations on services trade. At present, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade does not include services. Since the end of the Tokyo round of GATT negotiations in 1979, the United States has pressed to expand the scope of the GATT to include services trade. Ultimately, the United States succeeded in this effort, despite the opposition of a number of developing countries. Services were included on the GATT agenda at Punta del Este, Uruguay, in 1986.

At the December Montreal mid-term review of the current Uruguay round of GATT negotiations, important progress was made. Negotiators defined guiding principles for services trade and set a timeframe for completing an agreement. If a final agreement is reached, principles such as national treatment, nondiscrimination, and progressive liberalization will be applied to services trade, and regulations and guidelines for services trade will be made more transparent. In addition, at Montreal GATT ministers agreed to schedule sector-by-sector talks on specific services industries.

As the services sector has generated growth in the American economy, the United States has pressed for significant liberalization in services trade. Nevertheless, in this country the impact of services on the economy is not well documented. Government statistical methods focus on merchandise accounts, and inadequately represent trade in services. Better measurements should be devised to establish an adequate understanding of the services sectors. Hopefully, the services sector data provisions included in the 1988 trade bill will help to remedy this problem over the next several years. However, it is crucial that the U.S. delegation to the GATT have sufficient information to negotiate an agreement for services trade that is of maximum benefit to the U.S. economy. Thus, in the short term a White House conference could help generate an improved base of information to assist U.S. negotiators.

More accurate information would better enable the United States to clarify its priorities during the final 2 years of the Uruguay round. The White House conference could play a key role in highlighting the services industries which are most crucial to American commercial interests, and creating a strategy for each sector.

Information generated by the White House conference could assist U.S. negotiators in other ways as well. When investigating foreign trade barriers to specific industries under the procedures outlined by section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, the U.S. Trade Representative could take advantage of the base of information generated by the conference. As we all are aware, section 301 was amended last year by the trade bill to make Presidential action mandatory when the U.S. Trade Representative recommends retaliatory action against foreign trade barriers to American goods and services. It is almost certain to be used in future negotiations to open foreign markets, and the conference could clarify priorities to better reflect American commercial interests.

As services trade grows in importance to the U.S. economy, we must have a clear negotiating strategy and adequate statistical coverage of services industries. A White House conference would generate information and priorities for negotiating free trade in services. I urge the swift passage of this legislation and ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "White House Conference on International Trade in Services Act".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the service sector is a critical element of our Nation's trade policy;

(2) services trade now accounts for one third of all world trade;

S. 260. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to make the exclusion from gross income of amounts paid for employee educational assistance permanent; to the Committee on Finance.

EMPLOYEE EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce S. 260, the Employee Educational Assistance Act of 1989, that will make permanent section 127 of the Internal Revenue Code. This legislation will permit employees to receive educational benefits such as tuition reimbursement or outside training from their employers on a tax-free basis. I am pleased to be joined in introducing S. 260 by my distinguished colleagues, Senators HEINZ, DANFORTH, KERRY, PRYOR, REID, RIEGLE, SYMMS, DURENBERGER, and MATSUNAGA.

First enacted in 1978, section 127 has enabled over 7 million working men and women to advance their education and improve their job skills without incurring additional income tax liabilities. It permits an employee to exclude from income up to $5,250 in educational assistance provided by his or her employer. Without this exclusion, the employee would owe taxes on the value of an education assistance that does not directly relate to the current job held. Since section 127 effectively removes the requirement that educational benefits directly relate to any employee's job, it is also particularly important for lower skilled workers who want to upgrade their skills and vocational opportunities, and for retraining employees whose current skills have become technologically obsolete. For employees beginning their careers in secretarial, clerical, or industrial positions, section 127 may represent their only opportunity for retraining and advancement.

Section 127 expired at the end of last year, and the legislation that I introduce today would extend that section on a permanent basis. My bill would restore coverage of graduate-level courses—which was eliminated last year—as well as maintain the limit on the annual amount that can be excluded at $5,250.

It would also make an important contribution to simplicity in the Tax Code. Unless it is restored, employers and the IRS will have to determine on a case-by-case basis which educational benefits are sufficiently related to the job to avoid being treated as taxable income.

Allowing employees to receive educational assistance on a tax-free basis is also a time-tested and cost-effective way to upgrade the skills of American workers. It acts as an incentive for workers to increase their productivity as well as a way to enhance job satisfaction and improve career prospects.

Section 127 is not some extravagant fringe benefit for highly paid executives. Rather, it is low- and moderate-income employees who have benefited most from the section, and it is they who will be most severely affected if it is not restored. A recent survey undertaken by the American Society for Training and Development indicated that 72 percent of recipients of section 127 educational assistance earn less than $30,000 annually. In fact, lower income employees are even more likely to participate in educational assistance programs than those on the higher end of the income scale. Employees earning less than $30,000 participate at a much greater rate than those above that income, and participation rates decline as salary levels increase. Moreover, employees making less than $15,000 participate at almost twice the rate of those who earn over $50,000.

By removing the tax burden on employees seeking retraining, section 127 will also enable American workers to learn new skills, including those industrial workers whose jobs have been threatened by rapidly emerging technologies.

The American Electronics Association has noted that the United States is experiencing an acute shortage of engineers—some 20,000 engineers between 1981 and 1985. It has also emphasized the troubling fact that the United States produces fewer engineers per capita than many of our trading partners and has relatively smaller numbers of workers in research and development. To counter this trend, almost half of America's largest electronic firms have initiated educational assistance programs under section 127 to encourage employees to pursue advanced degrees in electronics. Without section 127, employees participating in this important effort to maintain our competitive position in the global economy will incur a penalty of additional taxes.

Mr. President, section 127 is of great value to the American economy and to the American economy and to the competitiveness of American industry in world markets. It removes a record-keeping burden on industry initiatives to provide education and retraining for employees. Retraining will take on an increasing importance in the next decade, given that approximately 85 percent of those who will make up the work force in the year 2000 are already working today. Work force growth in the next decade is expected to barely match that during the Great Depression.

Section 127 has also helped improve the quality of America's public educational system, at a fraction of the cost of direct-aid programs. It has enabled thousands of public school teachers to receive advanced degrees, augmenting the quality of instruction in our schools. A survey conducted by the National Education Association a few years ago found that almost half of all American public school systems provide tuition assistance to teachers seeking advanced training and degrees.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Employee Educational Assistance Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. EXCLUSION FOR EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS MADE PERMAMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 127 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to educational assistance programs) is amended by striking out subection (d).

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1988.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN.

S. 261. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to treat acts and practices of foreign countries that diminish the effectiveness of international agreements protecting endangered or threatened species as unreasonable for purposes of applying chapter 1 of title III of the Trade Act of 1974; to the Committee on Finance.

TREATMENT OF CERTAIN ACTS RELATIVE TO ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that would stengthen the hand of the President to enforce international agreements to protect endangered and threatened species by making actions that undermine such agreements unfair trade practices under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974. This bill would provide new hope to all those individuals and governments that have struggled to protect and conserve species that have been subjected to irresponsible commercial exploitation.

The General Accounting Office reported in December 1988 that the threat to endangered species is more severe now than in any age since the dinosaurs, and that threat is likely to become more acute in the near future. The GAO reports the existence of serious problems of information on declining species and a serious lack of resources devoted to wildlife protection.

Consequently, it is increasingly clear that preventing the irresponsible exploitation of wildlife can and should be a high priority of U.S. trade policy. In July 1988, I recommended to U.S. Trade Representative Yeutter that the United States urge the Uruguay Round of GATT negotiations to address the issue of illegal wildlife trade. After all, the most important international treaty protecting endangered species from commercial exploitation is the 1973 Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora, known as "CITES." The operative words in CITES are "international trade." Clearly, illegal trade in wildlife diminishes the effectiveness of international agreements and should be curbed in the same way the United States addresses other unfair trade practices by our trade partners.

My recommendation to Ambassador Yeutter was to amend the GATT rules to include a framework for enforcing international controls on wildlife trade. Article XX (g) of the GATT already recognizes the legality of conserving wildlife through trade law measures. A code to enforce international trade in endangered or threatened species should be in place before the completion of the Uruguay round.

In the absence of stronger trade enforcement measures, many wildlife species are being taken in violation of existing agreements such as CITES. Let us take the example of whales. CITES regulates trade in 11 species of whales. The United States has taken a leadership role in the protection of whaling, and the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling was signed in Washington in 1946.

We are all aware that on February 10, 1988, Secretary of Commerce Verity certified to the President, pursuant to the Packwood-Magnuson amendment to the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, that Japan was killing minke whales in the waters of the Antarctic in violation of the Whaling Convention.

Despite a moratorium on commercial whaling approved by the international community in 1985, and finally accepted by Japan in 1987, Japanese fishermen reportedly killed 300 minke whales.

Why? Japan claims that the recent whale killings are for scientific research. Reputable cetacean scientists outside of Japan disagree. The member governments of the International Whaling Commission voted 19 to 6 that the Japanese scientific hunt violated the moratorium. The reality is that Japan insists on maintaining its whale hunting—whatever the impact on international whale conservation efforts.

We must remember that the whale moratorium does not necessarily mean a complete future ban on whale hunting. The U.S. position is not motivated by a bias against cultural values that continue to accept the consumption of whale meat. Rather, what we are clearly saying is that the decimation of the Earth's whale population now requires the moratorium. We will not passively tolerate further extinctions.

And not just Japan is at fault. In July 1988 the State Department reportedly sent a letter to the Norwegian Foreign Ministry expressing concern about the planned harvest of 30 minke whales. Again, the rationale given for the hunt was "scientific research." However, the International Whaling Commission issued a resolution urging Norway not to take any minke whales until the Commission had more complete information about the scientific nature of the proposed hunt.

Nevertheless, the Norwegians proceeded with the harvest of minke whales. And they have not yet made the results of their scientific inquiry available. Norway's current view is ironic since it was Norway that first warned of the dangers of possible whale extinction in 1910. Iceland has also sought to evade the moratorium with scientific proposals.

We need time to do proper scientific research to adequately count the remaining stocks of whale species. Too much remains unknown. We do know many species are near extinction. Let us do the science together in compliance with the moratorium—the slaughter of additional whales need not be part of the effort.

The United States is now confronted with how to convince Japan, Norway, and Iceland to comply with the moratorium. Unfortunately, the International Whaling Commission has no power to enforce its regulations and findings. We can hope that a conservation movement will grow in Japan. But we cannot wait.

The U.S. Government has invoked sanctions before. But our legal armory in this regard is weak. On April 6, 1988, in response to Secretary Verity's certification, the President directed Secretary of State Shultz to terminate all Japanese fishing privileges in the 200-mile exclusive economic zone. However, since Japan currently has no fishing quota allocations within the U.S. zone, the measure was purely symbolic and had no effect. The Japanese Ministry of Fisheries announced that Japan began the harvest an additional 300 minke whales from the Antarctic this January, and the slaughter of these whales may be occurring even as I offer this legislation today.

The only remaining action at the President's discretion is to embargo Japan's fishery imports pursuant to the Pelly amendment to the Fisherman's Protective Act of 1967. Since we have a significant fishery products trade surplus with Japan, many fear that sanctions imposed in this sector may leave our fishery exports open to counterretaliation. Similar arguments have been invoked on prior occasions to avoid using the Pelly sanction. Although the Endangered Species Act Amendments passed by the Congress in 1988 broadened the definition of fishery products subject to retaliation to include pearl and coral jewelry, the scope of the sanction is still very limited.

The whale is not unique as a victim of commercial exploitation. The South American caiman, a species of crocodile, is illegally killed and its skin traded from South America to Asia. Brazil, Paraguay, and Uruguay are the major sources of caiman skins, which are smuggled to Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, and Thailand. Despite protection under CITES, trade in caiman skins increased dramatically. For example, Thailand exported over 120,000 skins to Japan in 1988, at a quantity greater than all the shipments from Thailand to Japan in the previous 25 years combined.

African elephants provide another example of a species protected under CITES which is threatened with extinction from illegal poaching operations. Elephant tusks provide raw ivory, which is carved in other countries. In the past few years, merchants exploited a loophole in Hong Kong's customs laws in order to import illegally obtained ivory from Burundi. In April 1988 the U.S. State Department informed Hong Kong that the United States would ban ivory products from Hong Kong unless action was taken to stop the illegal trade in Burundi ivory. By August 1988 Hong Kong had tightened its regulations restricting the trade in ivory and other endangered species protected by CITES. This shows that strong trade action can yield results. Since regulations in Hong Kong were tightened last summer, however, carving operations using illegally traded ivory have been relocated to at least four other countries, including South Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, and Thailand.

To capture the attention of the governments of countries where illegal trade in endangered species is known to occur, the United States should have the ability to selectively retaliate against all categories of imports. The governments involved would then be more likely to tighten restrictions on illegal trade in endangered species. If countries such as Japan and Hong Kong fail to comply with laws protecting endangered species such as the minke whale, the caiman or the African elephant, retaliatory action should, for example, could fall on sophisticated electronics or automotive producers imports from these nations.

Hence, my amendment. I would make foreign government practices that diminish the effectiveness of international agreements that protect endangered or threatened species actionable under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974. Such a change would greatly broaden the armory of retaliatory options available to the President. And the President could craft the proper response. Our ability to enforce conservation agreements would be improved and the security of many species enhanced.

In addition, private parties would also have the right to petition the U.S. Trade Representative under section 301 for relief against any burden caused by the failure of foreign governments to enforce agreements.

I hope that the Congress can move expeditiously to enact this legislation. The survival of important species around the globe may depend upon it.

S. 262. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to remove certain limitations on charitable contributions of certain items; to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL HERITAGE RESOURCE ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce S. 262, the National Heritage Resource Act of 1989, which will restore the ability of museums, public libraries, and research institutions in the United States to acquire collections of original works and papers of artists, writers, composers, and scientists.The National Heritage Resource Act of 1989 will ensure that America's cultural heritage will be preserved and made available in our institutions for public enjoyment and scholarly research. My distinguished colleagues, Senators DANFORTH, BAUCUS, PELL, and KENNEDY join me in introducing this legislation.

The National Heritage Resource Act of 1989 will repeal a change made to the Internal Revenue Code 20 years ago, which his adversely affected the efforts of public nonprofit and governmental institutions to preserve our cultural heritage. The 1969 change specifically denied to living painters, poets, scientists, composers, authors, and other creative artists a tax deduction for the fair market value of self-created works or papers that they personally donate to a charitable or educational institution. Individuals making such donations may deduct only the cost of materials used to produce the property—the paint and canvas, paper and ink, or the like. As a result, creators of artistic or literary property have a significant disincentive against donating their works to museums, libraries, or research institutions. By contrast, a purchaser of a painting or manuscript who subsequently donates the property receives a full fair market value deduction for the gift.

The impact of the 1969 change on the preservation of our cultural heritage for public enjoyment has been quite adverse. The tax bias against donations by original producers has meant that creative works and manuscripts now almost invariably go into the commercial market, either here or abroad. According to Dr. Daniel J. Boorstin, Librarian of Congress Emeritus, the Library of Congress was receiving manuscript collections totaling nearly 200,000 manuscripts each year prior to 1969. Since that time, the Library has received virtually no major gifts of self-created material from a living author. The Library of Congress' Music Division has been similarly affected: It received 1,200 manuscripts between 1963 and 1970, and only a relative handful of manuscripts in the decade after that.

The loss of the Igor Stravinsky manuscripts illustrates the problem in painful detail. In 1962, the great composer began to donate his manuscripts to the Library of Congress on a systematic basis. Two were given in that year, two in 1963, nine in 1964, four in 1965, and so on. By 1969, Dr. Boorstin has written, Stravinsky, then in his late eighties, initiated discussions with the chief of the Library's Music Division concerning the disposition of the entire body of his works. But the tax changes of that year brought the process to a halt, and the Stravinskly manuscript collection is now in the hands of a private foundation in Switzerland.

The experience of libraries and museums around the country has been similar. Hard hit by the change in the tax law have been institutions in California, Kansas, New Jersey, Iowa, Texas, Pennsylvania, and New York, to name just a few States. In New York State, New York University has reported a decline in donations by authors and artists of between 80 and 90 percent since 1969; the New York State Library has estimated a similar reduction in gifts of manuscripts. The Museum of Modern Art in New York City received donations of 52 works from creators in the 3 years before the provision went into effect, but less than a third of that in the last 16 years.

The long-term effects of the 1969 amendment have been a concern for some time. In 1981 a Presidential Task Force on the Arts and Humanities recommended repealing the 1969 provision, and the Senate Finance Committee approved a measure to do so in 1982, though the provision was not enacted into law. The decline in donations by the creators of cultural artifacts, and the toll on our cultural heritage, continues. The need for remedial action remains urgent.

The legislation I introduce today would restore the full fair market value deduction for creators of literary, musical, and artistic properties, giving them the same tax treatment as that given a purchaser or collector who donates such property. This will help to restore the past practice of direct donations to institutions by creators themselves, increasing the odds that their works and papers will be widely available for the enjoyment and edification of the many—not privately held for the more fortunate few. This change will also foster the ability of the individual artist, author, or composer to determine which institution would most benefit from receiving a work—an important factor in insuring the quality and integrity of collections, as noted by the Presidential Task Force on the Arts and Humanities.

The legislation I introduce today contains specific safeguards against abuse by donors. The bill requires that works for which a deduction are taken be in existence for at least 1 year before the work is donated to discourage tax-motivated transactions. Also, donors must obtain a written appraisal of the fair market value of the donated work, and file it with their return. The appraisal must include evidence of the extent to which the works of the donor are owned, maintained, or displayed by museums, libraries, research facilities, or similar institutions. Finally, the receiving institution must use the donated property in a manner related to its tax-exempt purpose.

The legislation also addresses a key concern that motivated the 1969 legislation: tax write-offs for the donation of papers by public officials. The bill flatly prohibits the use of the deduction for the donation of any letter, memorandum, or similar property written by or for an individual in furtherance of official duties while such individual was an officer or employee of the United States or any State or locality.

In this regard, it seems to me time that we be open about the origins of the 1969 legislation. You will imagine that it was not written into the Tax Code for the purpose of depriving the Library of Congress of the Stravinsky manuscripts. It was inserted in the Tax Reform Act of 1969 with the specific intent of denying a tax deduction to former President Lyndon B. Johnson and former Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey. Each was then retired—or so it was thought. Senator Humphrey of course gloriously returned to our ranks. One Senator sought to punish, in their political eclipse, two great public men who had been unassailable at the apogee of their influence and strength. But the legislation went far beyond its original narrow intent, catching in its net the entire creative community. A matter of indifference to its sponsor, perhaps, but hardly to us. A full political generation later, it is time for a remedy.

Mr. President, this legislation will provide that remedy. It will remove a tax disincentive presently discouraging our Nation's artists, poets, authors, composers, and scientists from favoring public institutions over the commercial market when it comes to the disposition of their works and papers. The public good is the ultimate beneficiary. This legislation helps to preserve the record of American civilization—our national heritage—by encouraging its deposit in the institutions most competent to preserve it and insure access to all. The need is great, and I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 263. A bill to exclude agent orange settlement payments from countable income and resources under Federal means-tested programs; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

PROTECT BENEFITS FOR AGENT ORANGE VICTIMS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to prevent disabled veterans and their survivors from losing Federal public assistance benefits if they are recipients of settlement payments in the litigation against the manufacturers of agent orange.

As announced by a Federal district court in Brooklyn last July, totally disabled Vietnam veterans who were exposed to the highly toxic herbicide agent orange will begin receiving payments early this year from the settlement of a suit against the chemical's makers.

Under this agreement, the chemical companies agreed to pay $180 million to settle all claims while admitting no liability for any injuries or deaths caused by the use of agent orange. To receive payments, a veteran must be totally disabled, must show exposure to agent orange in Vietnam, and show that the disability was not caused by another injury. Payments will also be made to the families of veterans whose deaths are linked to agent Orange.

Mr. President, based on court estimates, an eligible veteran will receive an average disability settlement of about $5,700. An eligible survivor will receive an average death payment of about $1,800. Of the 250,000 veterans who have filed preliminary claims, about 40,000 to 60,000 may be eligible for payments.

Without a change in the law, these settlement payments will be counted as income for purposes of determining eligibility for and benefit amounts under Federal programs such as supplemental security income, AFDC, and food stamps. My bill would change the law so that disabled veterans and their family members who receive Federal assistance benefits would not lose their benefits or have them reduced by reason of receiving these very modest agent orange settlement payments.

Mr. President, it seems to me but a small gesture for the Nation to make on behalf of the most vulnerable among our honorable Vietnam veterans. The Senate agreed to this provision last year as part of S. 2011, but it did not ultimately become law. This year we must see that it does.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 263

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AGENT ORANGE SETTLEMENT PAYMENTS EXCLUDED FROM COUNTABLE INCOME AND RESOURCES UNDER FEDERAL MEANS—TESTED PROGRAMS.

(a) IN GENERAL. —That none of the payments made from the Agent Orange Settlement Fund or any other fund established pursuant to the settlement in the In re Agent Orange product liability litigation, M.D.L. No. 381 (E.D.N.Y.), shall be considered income or resources in determining eligibility for or the amount of benefits under any Federal or Federally assisted program.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The provision in subsection (a) shall become effective upon the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DIXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. SARBANES, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 264. A bill to amend title 13, United States Code, to remedy the historic undercount on the poor and minorities in the decennial census of the population and to otherwise improve the overall accuracy of the population data collected in the decennial census by directing the use of appropriate statistical adjustment procedures, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DECENNIAL CENSUS IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Decennial Census Improvement Act of 1989. This legislation will ensure the "fair representation of the people," [1] Edmund Randolph's words, in the House of Representatives, and the equitable distribution of Federal funds based on population.

EQUAL REPRESENTATION AND THE CENSUS

Article I, section 2, clause 3 of the Constitution requires the Federal Government to conduct a decennial census. A national census was and is necessary to implement the terms of the Great Compromise, which, for all practical purposes, based the allocation of Congressmen in the House of Representatives solely on population. Indeed, only an accurate and honest census could accomplish this goal. As the Supreme Court stated in Wesberry versus Sanders (1964):

> While it may not be possible to draw congressional districts with mathematical precision, that is no excuse for ignoring our Constitution's plain objective of making equal representation for equal numbers of people the fundamental goal for the House of Representatives.[2]

Otherwise, the weight of each citizen's vote is diluted just as effectively as if one is prohibited from voting at all.

THE UNDERCOUNT

A census is never exact. Invariably, some persons are missed. An undercount is, to some degree or other, inevitable. Nonetheless, the Census Bureau has made considerable progress in reducing it over the years. In 1940, for example, the undercount for the population as a whole was 5.6 percent; by 1980, the total undercount had been reduced to between 1.4 and 1.6 percent. Despite this improvement, the Bureau of the Census continues to miss a significant portion of the population, particularly the nonwhite population, and those living in central cities across the country. The wide discrepancy that exists in the enumeration of whites versus nonwhites, as a proportion of the population, is referred to as the differential undercount.

In 1955 the demographer Ansley J. Coale established that the 1950 census missed a substantial proportion of the black population.[3] Subsequently, Jacob Siegel, senior demographic statistician at the Census Bureau, estimated the minority undercount for the 1950 census at 11.5 percent. Though the 1960 census did somewhat better, Siegel has concluded that 9.5 percent of blacks were missed and that the differential between whites and blacks remained pronounced.[4]

In 1966 when I became director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies at MIT and Harvard, I asked Prof. David Heer of the Harvard School of Public Health to work with me in planning a conference to publicize the nonwhite undercount in the 1960 census and to foster concern about the problem of obtaining a full enumeration, especially of the urban poor. It was our hope that the public airing of this issue would lead to greater public support for the Census Bureau to obtain the resources to deal with this problem in the 1970 census.

In his introduction to the published report of the conference, "Social Statistics and the City (1968)." Professor Heer described our planning:

> Daniel P. Moynihan, then Assistant Secretary of Labor, became aware of the findings concerning the underenumeration of nonwhites in the census while preparing his now famous report "The Negro Family: The Case for National Action," which was published in 1965.[5] In the fall of 1965 Moynihan became director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University. In December of that year he asked me if I would plan a conference that would (1) publicize the fact that many Negroes had not been counted in the 1960 Census and (2) attempt to arouse national concern about the matter. In further discussion we decided that the proposed conference should be broadened to include not only census underenumeration of Negroes but the adequacy of all official social statistics for Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexicans in the United States. In January 1967 the Carnegie Corporation of New York informed us that it was willing to provide financial support for the conference.
> A prime aim of the conference was to stimulate public interest in the importance of social statistics for Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexicans so that the chief agencies concerned with gathering such statistics—the U.S. Bureau of the Census and the National Center for Health Statistics—might obtain a more adequate budget from Congress to improve the quality and quantity of data for these groups. With this goal in mind we decided that the conference would have to be held before the fall of 1967, since the Bureau of the Budget was to decide upon the recommended appropriations for the 1970 Decennial Census at that time. The final dates established were June 22 and 23, 1967, and the conference was to be held in Washington, D.C.
> Among those providing invaluable assistance in planning the conference were Dr. A. Ross Eckler, Director of the U.S. Bureau of the Census; Dr. Conrad Taeuber, Assistant Director for Demographic Fields, U.S. Bureau of the Census; and Dr. Anders Lunde, Assistant Director of the Division of Vital Statistics, National Center for Health Statistics, U.S. Public Health Service. It was decided that six papers should be presented on the first day of the conference. On the morning of the second day, the participants would divide into three workshops to discuss recommendations with respect to each of the following topics: (1) ways of improving coverage of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, and Mexicans in the census, (2) ways of improving vital statistics for these groups, and (3) needed additions in available social statistics for the three groups. On the afternoon of the second day, the rapporteurs from each of the morning sessions would report the recommendations of their respective panels, and the conference as a whole would then adopt a general series of recommendations.[6]

Since the report was published, the decline in the undercount of minorities has continued. Still, in 1980 it remained disproportionately high. While the undercount for whites and nonblacks in 1980 was an estimated 0.7 percent, a much higher 5.9 percent of all blacks were not counted. Other estimates of the black undercount are even higher. In the last census, the Bureau estimates it missed some 1.5 million whites, and 1.67 million blacks. Thus, in 1980, blacks constituted 53 percent of all people missed in the census, even though they made up less than 12 percent of the total population—the official population. Moreover, 1980 was the first time in the history of the census that more blacks than whites were missed.

Some estimates also indicate that perhaps 5.9 percent of all Hispanics are not being counted. And the undercount rates among our central city population are estimated to be the highest. Possibly 6 percent of all central city inhabitants were missed in the 1980 count; 11.3 percent of black central city residents, and 10.3 percent of such Hispanic residents.

Merely increasing the resources available to the Census Bureau is not likely to remedy this differential undercount. During the 1980 census, the Bureau hired almost 300,000 temporary employees, but as Prof. Eugene Ericksen, of Temple University, testified before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee on September 4, 1986, finding people qualified to go into some urban areas remains a difficult problem. In addition, there is little time or money available to train this veritable army of enumerators.[7]

Indeed, the costs of doing so could be prohibitive. The 1980 census was the most expensive ever. According to the General Accounting Office, in constant dollars the cost of counting one person in 1980—$4.72—was more than double the 1960 cost—$2.30. And the National Academy of Sciences has determined that further coverage improvement programs are likely to be extremely expensive, costing as much as $75 per capita.

Prof. Everett S. Lee of the University of Massachusetts forecast this situation when he wrote in our 1968 conference report, "Social Statistics and the City" that:

[M]ore money will not in itself greatly improve the situation. Traditional census procedures, while highly effective, cannot be expected to provide the additional or better data needed in our effort to deal with the numerous problems posed by the disadvantaged. The Census Bureau has gone about as far as it can go with traditional procedures.[8]

Some analysts even suggest that increasing resources can actually worsen the differential undercount. For example, in 1980, additional resources helped to increase the count of whites more than the count of minorities, thus exacerbating the differential. At a conference held on the 1980 census post enumeration program in October 1980, Bureau Director Vincent Barabba admitted "[Y]ou could reduce the 1970 undercoverage level [by augmenting resources], but perhaps increase the differential." [9] At the same conference, Professor Nathan Keyfitz of Harvard University also stated:

[A]s the census pushes harder and reduces the undercount it is almost certain to increase the differential of the undercount.[10]

Finally, Jacob Siegel, who also participated in our 1967 conference, remarked:

Don't be surprised if you get something like an overcount of Whites and an undercount of Blacks with therefore an impossible-to-compute differential except in absolute terms or something that might go far beyond the 4 to 1 of 1970.[11]

IMPACT OF THE UNDERCOUNT

Estimates vary as to the impact of past undercounts on various communities, and there are divergent views about how an adjustment of the undercount would benefit different areas. But scholars agree that those groups which tend to be undercounted; namely, minorities, the poor, and the homeless—generally reside in the largest cities, and in poor or remote rural areas.

New York State officials estimate that the 1980 census left between 500,000 and 860,000 New Yorkers uncounted; others estimate that a large undercount in New York City was mitigated by a substantial overcount in other parts of the State, leaving a net undercount of some 250,000 people. Double counting of students, individuals with two homes, residential mobility, et cetera, all contribute to the overcount, which is most likely to occur in rural and more affluent areas.

There is a general agreement, however, that New York City suffered a substantial undercount—of at least a half million people—and lost one congressional seat as a result.

City officials, extrapolating from 1980 Census Bureau data, estimate the total city undercount at 7.4 percent, with the worst discrepancies in the black and hispanic counts. 15.2 percent of black New Yorkers were missed, and 12.4 percent of hispanics in the city may have been missed.

After the 1980 census the city and State of New York obtained a court order requiring the Census Bureau to accept "Were you Counted?" forms, distributed by the Census Bureau but not received within the Bureau's deadline. City officials claim that as a result of this action somewhere between 12,000 and 20,000 additional individuals were included in the final count. This balance, said city officials, saved a congressional seat for New York. Correction of the undercount does matter.

In addition to almost losing a second seat in Congress, city officials believe New York loses annually between $26 and $52 million in Federal and State dollars distributed on the basis of population. Among other cities, Chicago, Detroit, Kansas City, and Los Angeles have each alleged substantial undercounts in the 1980 census, with resulting loss of Federal aid and representation in Congress.

FEASIBILITY OF ADJUSTMENT

Statistical adjustments to remedy this situation are quite feasible. For example, in 1970, the Bureau of the Census imputed almost 5 million additional people to the count. Yet, the Department of Commerce—with jurisdiction over the Census Bureau—has decided not to adjust the 1990 census for the undercount. Announcing the Department's decision, Dr. Robert Ortner, Under Secretary for Economic Affairs, stated on October 30, 1987:

Adjustment would be controversial, even among statisticians. Techniques are available to adjust, but there are questions about the validity of their results * * *. Different statisticians would employ different models and get different results.[12]

Notwithstanding the Department's official position, the Census Bureau's former Associate Director for Statistical Standards and Methodology, Barbara Bailar, in her capacity as president of the American Statistical Association, stated that:

[T]he consensus of the statisticians—statisticians from government, industries, and academia, statisticians who have carefully reviewed all the work in this area—is that an adjustment will provide more accurate data on the size, location, and demography of the minority population in this country. It's time to get on with the job.[13]

Since making that statement, Ms. Bailar resigned her post in protest over Mr. Ortner's decision. While she opposed adjusting the 1980 census because suitable methodology did not exist, she is now convinced that it does and that the adjustment should be made.

Moreover, a panel of five Census statisticians—Dan Childers, Gregg Diffendal, Howard Hogan, Nathanial Schenker and Kirk Wolter—recently published a monograph titled, "The Technical Feasibility of Correcting the 1990 Census," substantiating Bailar's view that adjustment is feasible. Expressing their collective views, and not those of the Census Bureau per se, they concluded:

[A coverage measurement program exists] in which some weaknesses remain and must be addressed * * *. However, none of the weaknesses or errors are so large as to invalidate the adjustment * * *. On this basis, we conclude that it is technically feasible to correct the 1990 census for differential coverage.[14]

A CONSTITUTIONAL OBLIGATION

Since the feasibility of adjustment is widely admitted, the Bureau really does not have a choice about whether to undertake it. In 1967, I wrote in the foreward to "Social Statistics and the City" that:

[T]he full enumeration of the American population is not simply an optional public service provided by the government for the use of sales managers, sociologists, and regional planners. It is, rather, the constitutionally mandated process whereby political representation in the Congress is distributed as between different areas of the nation. It is a matter not of convenience but of the highest seriousness, affecting the very foundations of sovereignty. That being the case there is no lawful course but to provide the Bureau with whatever resources are necessary to obtain a full enumeration.[15]

After the 1980 census some 50 lawsuits were filed challenging its validity, primarily on the basis of the undercount. The Bureau argued that the words "actual enumeration" restricted it to a literal headcount. Though the Supreme Court has not yet had the opportunity to address the issue, these lower court cases clearly establish, assuming technical feasibility, the constitutional permissibility, if not requirement, of utilizing statistical adjustments to improve the accuracy of census figures used for both apportionment and funding purposes. As the Federal district court in Michigan stated in Young versus Klutznick (1980):

With the modern knowledge and the scientific techniques available to adjust for the known undercount differentials, and to bring about official population counts that are closer to the truth than those derived from the raw, unadjusted headcount, surely the framers of the Constitution would have intended that such an adjustment be made.[16]

The district court in Young further noted that if an adjustment is necessary in order to obtain a figure that more accurately reflects the actual population, article I of the Constitution and the 14th amendment would mandate such an adjustment. Thus, in response to the question of whether a headcount unadjusted for an acknowledged undercount could be used for apportionment and distribution of Federal funds, the district court stated, "The answer is clearly no" and ordered the 1990 census figures to be adjusted.

In 1981, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed this decision for unrelated procedural reasons. However, as Judge Keith of the sixth circuit emphasized in his dissent, the district court's "formulation of the law governing this controversy is unassailable." He futher noted that:

Since the sole constitutional function of the decennial census is to provide a population base for reapportionment of congressional districts, the Census Bureau is bound by the Constitution to count people as accurately as possible.[17]

In Carey versus Klutznick (1980), the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York held that statistical adjustments to improve the accuracy of the count were:

[R]equired to prevent an unwarranted dilution of the votes of New York City and New York State residents. The Constitution requires no less. (emphasis supplied).[18]

The second circuit reversed the district court on procedural grounds, but in so doing stated:

We also agree with the district court that the appellees [the City and State of New York] have demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits." [19]

Specifically, the second circuit affirmed that the Constitution required the Bureau to determine the population as accurately as possible and that statistical adjustments were not prohibited. In so doing, the court restated a principle laid down in 1832 by Daniel Webster in discussing the subject of apportionment:

That which cannot be done perfectly, must be done in a manner as near perfection as can be. If exactness cannot, from the nature of things, be attained, then the greatest practicable approach to exactness ought to be made.[20]

The Constitution provides that the census shall be made "in such manner as [Congress] shall by law direct." If Congress does not exercise its constitutional responsibility, the courts will be forced to resolve the undercount problem. However, the prospect of another 50-plus lawsuits challenging the 1990 census is not likely to satisfy either the Bureau or its critics. As the Federal District Court in city of Philadelphia versus Klutznick (1980) observed, allowing the courts to address this issue on an ad hoc basis "sacrifice[s] the national [census] program to the exact dangers of local manipulation and bias, no matter how well intentioned, the framers sought to avoid."[21]

In December 1987 Judge John E. Sprizzo ruled against the city and State of New York in Carey v. Klutznick, sub. nom, Cuomo v. Baldridge, 80 Civ. 4550 (S.D.N.Y.), which the court of appeals had remanded to the district court for further factual inquiry regarding the technical feasibility of adjustment. Based on the facts as they existed at the time of the law suit in 1980, Judge Sprizzo agreed with the Bureau's contention that it could not be sure of making an accurate adjustment for the whole country. He ruled simply on the facts, not the law. And as the testimony of many statisticians and demographers, including the Census Bureau's former top statistician, Barbara Bailar, reveals, the facts have since changed.

THE NEED FOR LEGISLATION

We in Congress and city and State officials concerned about the national undercount were hoping this problem could be resolved without Federal legislation. Once the 1980 undercount levels were determined, the Census Bureau agreed to study the possibility of undertaking an automatic adjustment of the 1990 Census to correct for the inevitable undercount.

In congressional testimony, the Bureau has committed to undertake a post enumeration survey, used to estimate the size of the undercount. However, it would not agree to actually adjust the count, based on the survey findings. Finally, in his statement on October 31, 1987, Dr. Ortner announced officially that Census will not adjust the 1990 census for any undercount.

Thus, I see no alternative but to mandate a correction through statute. The purpose of the legislation I offer today is most straightforward: To improve the overall accuracy of the population data collected in the decennial census. It would require the Secretary of Commerce to adjust all subsequent decennial censuses to correct for any undercounts or overcounts, using "the most accurate methods available." This corrected data will be the only set of census data, and will be used for all purposes for which such data are needed. As such, this data will be the basis for apportionment of seats in Congress, as well as distribution of Federal aid based on population. The Secretary would be required to notify Congress of his or her plans to adjust at least 6 months prior to each decennial census.

It is up to Congress. A constitutional obligation exists, and the methodology is sufficiently understood. Will we meet this challenge and ensure that each and every citizen receives equal representation and a fair share of Federal funds, or will we allow the courts to do this for us?

I urge the support of my colleagues in this important matter of fairness and equity as provided by our Constitution.

SOCIAL STATISTICS AND THE CITY

FOREWORD

At one point in the course of the 1950's John Kenneth Galbraith observed that it is the statisticians, as much as any single group, who shape public policy, for the simple reason that societies never really become effectively concerned with social problems until they learn to measure them. An unassuming truth, perhaps, but a mighty one, and one that did more than he may know to sustain morale in a number of Washington bureaucracies (hateful word!) during a period when the relevant cabinet officers had on their own reached very much the same conclusion—and distrusted their charges all the more in consequence. For it is one of the ironies of American government that individuals and groups that have been most resistant to liberal social change have quite accurately perceived that social statistics are all too readily transformed into political dynamite, whilst in a curious way the reform temperament has tended to view the whole statistical process as plodding, overcautious, and somehow a brake on progress. (Why must every statistic be accompanied by detailed notes about the size of the "standard error"?)

The answer, of course, is that this is what must be done if the fact is to be accurately stated, and ultimately accepted. But, given this atmosphere of suspicion on the one hand and impatience on the other, it is something of a wonder that the statistical officers of the federal government have with such fortitude and fairness remained faithful to a high intellectual calling, and an even more demanding public trust.

There is no agency of which this is more true than the Bureau of the Census, the first, and still the most important, information-gathering agency of the federal government. For getting on, now, for two centuries, the Census has collected and compiled the essential facts of the American experience. Of late the ten-year cycle has begun to modulate somewhat, and as more and more current reports have been forthcoming, the Census has been quietly transforming itself into a continuously flowing source of information about the American people. In turn, American society has become more and more dependent on it. It would be difficult to find an aspect of public or private life not touched and somehow shaped by Census information. And yet for all this, it is somehow ignored. To declare that the Census is without friends would be absurd. But partisans? When Census appropriations are cut, who bleeds on Capitol Hill or in the Executive Office of the President? The answer is almost everyone in general, and therefore no one in particular. But the result, too often, is the neglect, even the abuse, of an indispensable public institution, which often of late has served better than it has been served.

The papers in this collection, as Professor Heer's introduction explains, were presented at a conference held in June 1967 with the avowed purpose of arousing a measure of public concern about the difficulties encountered by the Census in obtaining a full count of the urban poor, especially perhaps the Negro poor. It became apparent, for example, that in 1960 one-fifth of nonwhite males aged 25–29 had in effect disappeared and had been left out of the Census count altogether. Invisible men. Altogether, one-tenth of the nonwhite population had been "missed." The ramifications of this fact were considerable, and its implications will suggest themselves immediately. It was hoped that a public airing of the issue might lead to greater public support to ensure that the Census would have the resources in 1970 to do what is, after all, its fundamental job, that of counting all the American people. As the reader will see, the scholarly case for providing this support was made with considerable energy and candor. But perhaps the most compelling argument arose from a chance remark by a conference participant to the effect that if the decennial census were not required by the Constitution, the Bureau would doubtless never have survived the economy drives of the nineteenth century. The thought flashed: The full enumeration of the American population is not simply an optional public service provided by government for the use of sales managers, sociologists, and regional planners. It is, rather, the constitutionally mandated process whereby political representation in the Congress is distributed as between different areas of the nation. It is a matter not of convenience but of the highest seriousness, affecting the very foundations of sovereignty. That being the case, there is no lawful course but to provide the Bureau with whatever resources are necessary to obtain a full enumeration. Inasmuch as Negroes and other "minorities" are concentrated in specific urban locations, to undercount significantly the population in those areas is to deny residents their rights under Article I, Section 3 of the Constitution, as well, no doubt, as under Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Given the further, more recent practice of distributing federal, state, and local categorical aid on the basis not only of the number but also social and economic characteristics of local populations, the constitutional case for full enumeration would seem to be further strengthened.

A sound legal case? Others will judge; and possibly one day the courts will decide. But of one thing the conference had no doubt: the common-sense case is irrefutable. America needs to count all its people. (And reciprocally, all its people need to make themselves available to be counted.) But if the legal case adds any strength to the commonsense argument, it remains only to add that should either of the arguments bring some improvement in the future, it will be but another instance of the generosity of the Carnegie Corporation, which provided funds for the conference and for this publication.

Director, Joint Center for Urban Studies.
CAMBRIDGE, MA, February 1968.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, in introducing the Decennial Census Improvement Act of 1989.

This measure is substantially the same bill we offered during the 100th Congress. The general thrust of the bill is simply to assure that the decennial census is as accurate as is feasible. The bill requires the Census Bureau to employ the most accurate statistical methods available and to adjust that data based on count improvement program data.

Every census since 1950 has resulted in undercount to one degree or another. Undercount has been particularly acute in densely populated urban areas throughout the country.

Undercount results for several reasons. First, for a variety of reasons, many people simply don't return the questionnaire. Second, the questionnaires are not always answered accurately. It is believed that some households consisting of a large number of individuals, concerned that they may be in violation of the law; that is, housing codes, immigration laws, do not report the true size of the household. And finally, individuals who do not have a fixed residence often go uncounted.

The magnitude of past undercounts gives cause for concern. In 1980, for example, the undercount for the country as a whole was 1.4 percent. The national undercount for blacks was 5.9 percent and over 4 percent for Hispanics. What is truly alarming, however, is that undercount in central cities for blacks was 11.3 percent and 10.3 percent for Hispanics. Moreover, of all persons not counted in 1980, 53 percent were black.

These statistics point up the fact that undercount is a serious problem, especially as it relates to urban areas and minorities.

What does the Census Bureau presently plan to do about this problem? The short answer is, not much. The Bureau does plan to conduct numerous "coverage improvement programs" in order to evaluate the extent of overcount and undercount. Surprisingly, though, it was announced in October 1987 that the Bureau was no longer planning to adjust the 1990 census results to make up for the undercount.

This decision was a mistake. The measure we propose today will vitiate that decision and require the Census Bureau to use the most accurate statistical methods available to determine the extent of undercount, and then to adjust the original census numbers to correct for undercount.

An accurate census is vital to effectuate numerous public policies. Perhaps most importantly, it is used to carry out the constitutional mandate of equal representation through the proper distribution of congressional seats. In New York State, for example, experts estimate that one additional congressional seat was lost due directly to undercount.

Census data is used to assure compliance with the Voting Rights Act, as well as to allocate millions of Federal and State funds. On this point, experts estimate that New York City, as a result of undercount, loses annually $26 to $52 million in Federal and State moneys distributed on the basis of population count.

And finally, census figures serve as the basis for calculating Federal statistics throughout the subsequent decade. Thus, if the base is incorrect all statistics flowing therefrom will likewise be wrong.

The importance of this measure is crystal clear. With 1990 in sight, swift enactment of this bill is critical to assure ample time for Census Bureau planning. I urge my colleagues to join us in promptly moving this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. President.

S. 265. A bill to provide Federal grants to States for programs to identify and aid individuals who have been exposed to the drug diethylstilbestrol [DES]; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EXPOSURE TO DES

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, similar to legislation I introduced in the 99th Congress and the 100th Congress, that will hopefully bring to the forefront the plight of those women and their children who have been exposed to the hormone diethylstilbestrol [DES] in our recent past.

The hormone DES was first synthesized in 1938. During the time period from 1941 to 1971, this hormone to help reduce the risk of miscarriages. Despite studies in the early 1950's demonstrating that the drug was ineffective, the distribution and use continued for another 20 years. It was not until 1971, with the establishment of the definitive link between the development of a rare form of cancer of the cervix and vagina in young women and their exposure to DES of their mothers during pregnancy, that its use was finally discontinued. It is estimated that during this 30-year span of time 4 million sons and daughters were exposed in utero. Since 1971, a stream of reports related to the medical side effects of DES exposure have become known. For the record, I will briefly summarize these findings and will describe them as they relate to DES mothers, daughters, and sons, respectively.

Mr. President, with regard to DES mothers, a study by the Dartmouth Medical School has demonstrated an increased risk of breast cancer in women exposed during pregnancy. A significant aspect of this discovery was the finding that this increased risk did not become clinically evident until 20 years after the actual exposure. As these women age, this risk may become even more pronounced.

With regard to DES daughters, an association between DES exposure during pregnancy and the rare clear-cell adenocarcinoma of the cervix and vagina has been well documented and studied. Over 400 cases have been reported and approximately 1 out of every 1,000 DES daughters will develop this rare cancer before age 32. Twenty-five percent of these cancer victims may die as a result of their exposure. Because of their cancer risk, DES daughters must have special screening examinations by doctors trained in the techniques needed to detect this rare form of cancer. DES daughters also have twice the rate of dysplasia as nonexposed women: in some women, dysplasia is a precancerous condition. For this reason, DES daughters should be especially careful to have regular examinations.

Pregnancy problems are affecting the greatest number of DES daughters. Up to half of all DES daughters will have some kind of problem, including ectopic—tubal—pregnancy, miscarriage, and premature labor and delivery. Because of their pregnancy risks, DES daughters must be seen more frequently during pregnancy.

The health risks for DES sons have been less well studied. However, some studies have shown an increased risk of genital problems and infertility among DES sons. Current research is investigating risks associated with testicular cancer.

This legislation would provide support to States for efforts to identify individuals who were exposed to DES and to help these individuals lessen the serious health risks resulting from exposure to DES. Grants to States would be used to identify women who took DES during pregnancy and the children of these women and to educate the public about the importance of medical care to detect and treat conditions resulting from DES exposure. The establishment of a voluntary State registry would be used for the dissemination of information about DES. The bill also provides for the creation of State programs to help in the development of screening and diagnostic services and the dissemination of information to health care providers.

It is clear that individuals exposed to DES will require regular and periodic evaluation for the rest of their lives. This bill will greatly increase available support for educational activities and the delivery of adequate health services to those in need. With this increase in support we begin to reduce the serious health risks to DES mothers and their children.

DES Action is a national organization devoted to helping those exposed to DES. This volunteer group should be commended for their efforts as a national educational, advocacy, and referral center on behalf of individuals who have been exposed to DES. DES is currently authorized for use to treat certain types of cancer, and as "estrogen replacement therapy" for menopausal women. It is not authorized for use to suppress lactation in women who choose not to breast feed, as a postcoital contraceptive, or in animal feed. Nevertheless, these uses sometimes continue, without evidence of safety. It is only through a greater public awareness of the DES problem will we be able to ascertain the extent and scope of the problem and implement the appropriate care.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 266. A bill to promote international fairness on the underwriting and distribution of Government securities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES FAIR COMPETITION ACT OF 1989

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation intended to further the clear purpose of an important provision of the 1988 Trade Act and to rectify a situation that is contrary to that congressional intent. As part of the Trade Act, we recognized that the opportunities for American securities dealers to underwrite and distribute the debt instruments of foreign governments are impaired by barriers imposed by foreign governments. On the other hand the U.S. subsidiaries of foreign securities firms have a full opportunity to compete with U.S. firms for the business of underwriting and distributing the debt instruments of the U.S. Government.

The Trade Act dealt with both existing primary dealers which are the subsidiaries of foreign firms and with applications of foreign affiliated firms to become primary dealers. In preserving the Federal Reserve Board's authority to designate primary dealers, the Trade Act allowed the Fed to continue current primary dealer designations and to grant new primary dealer designations without regard to the "National treatment" requirements of the trade bill for a period of 1 year after enactment of the legislation. The bill did this by an effective date which applied to the entire provision. A better approach would have been to delay effectiveness, if at all, only for application of "national treatment" requirements to existing primary dealers. I can only hope that such was the intent of those who crafted the legislation. In my view it clearly should have been their intent. I am most certain of the wisdom of this approach in light of recent events since it is apparent that the spirit of this Trade Act provisions has not been heeded by the Federal Reserve Board.

The New York Fed has granted primary dealer status to the subsidiary of Yamaichi Securities at a time when the Japanese are taking only minor steps toward opening their market for Government securities underwriting. Furthermore, the Fed has taken this action in light of the fact that there are already many Japanese-affiliated primary dealers. While the goal of the Trade Act—opening Japanese Government securities underwriting to United States firms—remains unaccomplished, it is highly counterproductive for the Fed to further broaden Japanese access to domestic business.

I have written to the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board expressing my concern over this action and Chairman Greenspan has responded in his usual prompt and thorough manner. However, I still differ with the position that the Fed has taken and take issue with the Chairman's response to my letter. While he states that at the end of a year the Fed can withdraw the Yamaichi designation, I find this a small comfort. I differ particularly on the apparent judgment of the Fed that granting the Yamaichi designation will not send the wrong signal to officials in Japan and other countries. However, I do appreciate the Chairman's response; furthermore, I respect his opinion and his belief that the Fed action on Yamaichi was within the letter of the law. I continue to differ with his interpretation of the spirit of the law and whether granting additional primary dealer designations to Japanese dealers at this time promotes the purpose of the Trade Act.

I hasten to emphasize that I do not intend to express any protectionist sentiment. This bill is intended to promote fair and open competition for Government securities underwriting. Indeed I believe it is unfortunate that such retaliatory measures, however mild, are necessary to provide fair access for U.S. dealers. However, it is beyond dispute that fair access to the Japanese market did not exist at the time the trade bill was enacted and does not exist now. Furthermore, the Fed's recent action only prolongs the time before such fair and competitive access will be possible.

Therefore, I introduce this legislation for a simple purpose—to hasten fair and competitive access to Government securities dealerships. This is done in two ways. First, it takes the exact language of the Trade Act which expressed the will of Congress on this subject and amends the effective date to eliminate the 1-year delay in effectiveness. This would prevent any additional designations of Japanese-owned primary dealers until such time as the goal of national treatment has actually been realized. It would also prompt the Fed to withdraw current primary dealer designation from Japanese firms unless national treatment is obtained immediately. Of course, the same provision would apply to any other firm whose home country does not accord national treatment to U.S. dealers. As 1992 rapidly approaches, a bill such as this sends a message to the European Economic Community that "Fortress Europe," should it prove more than a fearful spectre, would run afoul of a strong United States policy.

Second, this bill includes an amendment to the securities law that passed the Senate in the 100th Congress as section 910 of S. 1886, the Proxmire Financial Modernization Act. This provision further promotes the goal of fair competition for U.S. securities dealers in foreign markets by prohibiting the acquisitions of a U.S. broker or dealer by a foreign firm of a country that does not provide national treatment to U.S. firms.

In conclusion, I introduce this legislation for the purpose of promoting the specific purpose embodied in the Trade Act and to the control the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board so that it will take no further actions in contradiction to this purpose.●

S. 267. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands in Idaho to Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Blevins of Kuna, ID; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CERTAIN IDAHO LANDS TO MR. AND MRS. KENNETH BLEVINS

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth D. Blevins presently occupy an 800-acre tract of land near Kuna, ID, described as the east half, southeast quarter, section 33, township 2 north, range 1 east, Boise Meridian, ID, they believed they own. This tract is the remaining part of a 160-acre Reclamation Homestead entry filed in 1904 in connection with the Boise Valley Reclamation Project. Eighty of the original 160 acres were patented in 1919; however, the 80-acre tract occupied currently by the Blevins was never patented and is still under Bureau of Reclamation withdrawal.

The Ada County Recorder shows this 80-acre tract was quitclaim deeded to W.D. Bales in November 1929, by the Ada County probate judge. This may have been the point at which the tract's status as a reclamation homestead entry was overlooked and the assumption made that it had been in private ownership. The land north of the High Lateral in the northern part of the tract was sold to Martin Blevins in August 1941, by the Boise-Kuna Irrigation District. The district had acquired that part of the 80-acre tract for delinquent taxes.

The larger portion of the tract was originally purchased by Martin and Mary Blevins, Kenneth's parents, in 1961 from a Mrs. Clark. Martin Blevins received a bargain and sale deed for the property at the time of conveyance. In 1973, he conveyed title to his son, Kenneth, and issued him a warranty deed. The Blevins family has occupied this property continuously since 1961 under the assumption that they own the land, and have been paying property taxes during this entire time.

The Bureau of Reclamation has examined the possibility of conveying the land to the Blevins under the Reclamation Homestead Act. To qualify, one-half of the land must have been irrigated prior to the act of October 21, 1976 [FLPMA], which repealed the laws relating to homesteading. Only a few acres of this tract appear to have been irrigated with project water. It is presently utilized for dry sagebrush-grass grazing and has a carrying capacity of about one animal unit per month per 10 acres. About 75 percent of the tract was above the project's old High Lateral and could not qualify for patent under the requirements for reclamation homestead entry. Part of the tract had been irrigated for a few years by natural flow from Indian Creek which flows through the northeastern part of the tract.

Homesteading under the Bureau of Land Management [BLM] authorities was also considered. The laws relating to homesteading were repealed by the act of October 21, 1976, [FLPMA] act. The BLM no longer has authority to issue patents for homestead land. At present BLM has no way of disposing of this tract due to the Bureau of Reclamation first form withdrawal.

It appears that the only means by which this parcel can be conveyed to the Blevins is through the legislation the senior Senator from Idaho and I are introducing today, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior shall convey to Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Blevins of Kuna, Idaho, by quitclaim deed or other appropriate instrument and without consideration, all right, title, and interest of the United States, excluding oil, gas, and other mineral deposits, in and to a parcel of public land described as the East half, Southeast Quarter (E1/2SE¼) of Section 33, Township 2 North, Range 1 East, of the Boise Meridian in Ada County, Idaho.●

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 268. A bill to amend the State Dependent Care Development Grants Act to strengthen the program for grants to States for dependent care programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

STATE DEPENDENT CARE GRANTS AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1989

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to enhance the Dependent Care State Grant Program which I first proposed in the 97th Congress. The bill I am introducing today, similar to S. 222 which I introduced in the 100th Congress, would remove the prohibition, in certain circumstances, against using funds under this grant program for operating expenses. This will aid communities in their efforts to provide before and after school child care and assistance to parents and guardians who are searching for quality dependent care services. The first type of child care program that is funded by the Dependent Care State Grant Program is before the after school care for children in schools or community facilities for all children who are by State law provided free public education. A second type of program is a resource and referral service to assist parents and guardians in finding quality care for children and dependents of all ages, including elderly and disabled persons. This bill would permit States to use grant funds to cover the operating costs of both types of programs that were established or improved with dependent care State grants.

This legislation permits the use of funds for the operating costs of before and after school programs for the purpose of enabling children whose families are unable to meet the expense of program fees to participate in the program. A recent survey revealed that before or after school programs have not been established in many communities due to a concern that ongoing operating costs could not be covered by parents' payment of program fees. Both predominantly low-income communities and ones that have a mix of low and middle income families are likely to encounter difficulties in maintaining before and after school child care programs. In the absence of operating funds for programs in such communities, the provision of startup funds fails to meet the need for school age child care.

The availability of affordable, high quality school age child care is of vital importance to all children, and especially important to low-income children. Research suggests that low-income children are more likely to suffer negative effects of caring for themselves on a regular basis without adult supervision. These negative consequences include serious behavior and academic problems that can severely jeopardize a child's health development. For all children, even a relatively low risk of serious problems associated with self-care is unacceptable. It has been estimated that at least 5 million school age children are in self-care: If only 1 percent experience physical harm in fires, accidents, or assaults, the net effect would be at least 50,000 physical casualties. If only 10 percent of these children experience serious fear, that means potential psychological harm to 500,000 children.

Mr. President, this bill would help ensure that more children whose parents have limited resources for child care would be able to benefit from before and after school child care programs. This legislation would also permit the use of dependent care State grants to fund the operation of resource and referral systems. Like direct service child care programs, resource and referral systems require funds for ongoing operating expenses. The services these systems provide are extremely valuable to parents and guardians who are seeking high quality care for dependent persons. Resource and referral services educate consumers about the characteristics of quality care, increasing the likelihood that all forms of dependent care in a community will adhere to high standards in meeting the needs of different age groups and individuals with special needs. Resource and referral services may also provide technical assistance to providers of dependent care and offer other means of enhancing the quality of care. For most families in need of dependent care, a resource and referral service means the difference between guessing at what might be an adequate care arrangement and making an informed choice about a dependent care service that best meets the needs of the individual in care and the family.

The use of dependent care State grants to fund the operation of before and after school child care programs and resource and referral systems will extend both the availability and quality of dependent care for children, elderly, and disabled persons. In order to carefully assess the use of dependent care State grants for future planning, this bill also specifies important information that States will provide to the Secretary of Health and Human Services about the children and other dependents that are served by the program. This legislation is an important step encouraging the planning of future efforts to ensure that excellent dependent care is available to families.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 269. A bill to prohibit the disposal of solid waste in any State other than the State in which the waste was generated; to the Committee on the Environment and Public Works.

PROHIBITION OF INTERSTATE DISPOSAL

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing a bill to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to involving the issue of interstate transport of solid waste. This bill would prohibit the disposal of solid waste in any State other than the State in which the waste was generated without the consent of the recipient State.

As landfills fill up around the country and the cost of disposal increases, finding suitable disposal sites for solid waste has become more difficult. Some States have been sending their wastes across State lines for disposal. This may be fine when the receiving State is able to accommodate the waste, when concerns about the health and safety of local residents are addressed, and when a State feels that compensation is adequate. But there are times when a community is unwilling or unable to accept trash from another area. When this involves interstate movement of waste, concerned officials have little recourse to act in their community's interest.

This situation recently arose in Michigan. A Pennsylvania company purchased a landfill in Port Huron, MI, with the intention of bringing in a large volume of waste from another State which would have significantly increased the total volume of waste being disposed of in Michigan.

The huge volume of solid waste we produce every day has become a major environmental problem in this country. In 1988, communities in the United States generated some 160 million tons of solid waste. This amount is expected to grow over 190 million tons in the year 2000.

While the amount of solid waste we generate is increasing, the capacity for acceptable disposal is rapidly decreasing. The Environmental Protection Agency expects half of all existing landfills to close within 5 years. Additionally, the incease in disposal costs has resulted in communities transporting their wastes greater distances. For example, the cost of landfills in States such as New Jersey is $102 to $137 per ton of garbage, while landfills in Michigan charge on the average $20 per ton. This is why we are seeing more States look outside their own boundaries for disposal.

Although some States have their own solid waste management programs which prohibit interstate disposal, the constitutionality of these programs has been challenged. We must, therefore, address this issue at the national level.

Each State and its citizens should be responsible for the disposal of its own trash. Prohibiting States from shipping wastes across their borders will help stop the "out-of-sight, out-of-mind" syndrome and create incentives for increased recycling, reuse, and waste minimization.

This Congress will be looking into issues relating to solid waste disposal as it works to reauthorize the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. I would like to alert my colleagues, especially those on the Senate Environment Committee, to this particular problem. I believe we need to take steps to address the solid waste problem at the national level, and take action to prevent States from dumping unwanted wastes in other States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 269

"It shall be unlawful for any person to transport any quantity of solid waste in excess of 100 pounds from one State to another State, or political subdivision thereof, for disposal or to dispose of any quantity of solid waste in excess of 100 pounds in any State, or political subdivision thereof, other than the State in which the waste was generated, unless the State or political subdivision in which such waste is to be disposed of or deposited has given its consent thereto. Any person who knowingly violates the prohibition contained in this section shall, upon conviction, be subject to a fine or not more than $25,000 (or in the case of a second or subsequent conviction for the same offense, a fine of not more than $50,000 and imprisonment for not more than 5 years).".

By Mr. LEAHY (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. SIMON, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. KOHL):

S. 270. A bill to modify the application of the antitrust laws to encourage the licensing and other use of certain intellectual property; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY ANTITRUST PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce the Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989. I have worked hard on this legislation with my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee for the past 2 years. This bill (title I of S. 438 from the 100th Congress) has been broadly supported by a bipartisan effort in the Senate and is widely endorsed by technology companies and experts in intellectual property and antitrust law. Senators HATCH, BIDEN, THURMOND, DECONCINI, HUMPHREY, SIMON, KENNEDY and KOHL, all cosponsor this bill. We will be working together on this legislation over the next few months, and we will work closely with Congressman FISH who sponsors the House legislation.

The purpose of the Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act is to promote competition in the international market of ideas—a market which becomes increasingly important as technology takes us into the 21st century. It does so by harmonizing our intellectual property and antitrust laws.

The Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989 is designed to strengthen the ability of U.S. companies to compete in international high technology markets by providing greater flexibility in the dissemination of intellectual property and innovative products. It does so by clarifying the treatment of intellectual property rights under the antitrust laws by prohibiting courts from presuming the market power necessary for antitrust liability from the existence of an intellectual property right. Importantly, it will allow small inventors and entrepreneurs who are vital to continued innovation in high technology to produce, distribute and market their ideas in a way which allows them to recover their tremendous investment in research and development. At the same time, it preserves antitrust remedies for those agreements which actually harm competition.

Mr. President, strong antitrust enforcement is necessary to promote competition. To maintain strong antitrust enforcement, we must recognize when our antitrust laws begin to operate against competition and modify them to produce good economic and social results.

Let me explain how basic intellectual property principles can get stymied in antitrust suits. Courts often presume the requisite market power for antitrust liability from the mere existence of a patent or copyright. See Digidyne Corp. v. Data General Corp., 734 F. 2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 908 (1985). This presumption evolved because courts mistakenly characterized intellectual property rights as economic monopolies and thus treated patents and copyrights unnecessarily harshly in antitrust cases.

As a result, American businesses may be forced to avoid agreements that would permit them, for example, to cut costs by developing efficient distribution schemes for functionally related products. In some cases, the threat of antitrust liability even deters American companies and particularly small businesses and individual inventors from developing new technology. For example, if an inventor's ability to license his product, or the intellectual property rights to that product, is seriously threatened by the fear of treble damages being imposed in an antitrust suit, he likely will decide at the outset not to invest the time and money to research and develop that idea. This is especially true in our high technology industries whose products have short shelf lives.

Commentators writing on the subject and witnesses before our joint hearing in the Antitrust and Technology and the Law Subcommittees denounced the market power presumption. They have demonstrated that the uniqueness of a product protected by an intellectual property right has no bearing on whether the product wields market power—it may face lively competition from equally unique products.

The elimination of the presumption of market power is intended to reduce the likelihood that antitrust claims will be brought against intellectual property owners who should not be subject to antitrust liability. This bill clarifies that although patents and copyrights constitute legally enforceable property rights, they do not necessarily constitute economic monopolies. Similarly, the bill clarifies that although the uniqueness or distinctiveness of a particular product may be essential to the award of a patent or copyright, the patent or copyright does not necessarily result in economic power when evaluated under standard antitrust principles.

As stated in the Judiciary Committee's report on this legislation, Report 100-492, the elimination of the presumption will simply require plaintiffs to assume their proper burden of proof in antitrust cases involving patents, copyrights, or semiconductor chip designs. It will require that courts evaluate practices involving intellectual property rights under the same antitrust principles that are applied to practices involving other forms of property.

This legislation is also intended to preclude a plaintiff from establishing that a defendant has the requisite market share for antitrust liability by asserting that an intellectual property right constitutes its own market. Without proof of the absence of substitutes for the patented or copyrighted product, an intellectual property right does not itself constitute a market.

Mr. President, the Senate passed this legislation three times in the last Congress. See 134 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD S14438 (October 4, 1988), S15948 and S16321 (October 14, 1988). I look forward to getting this important piece of legislation to the House for consideration by our colleagues there, early in this session.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989".

PROHIBITION OF MARKET POWER PRESUMPTION

SEC. 2. In any action in which the conduct of an owner, licensor, licensee, or other holder of an intellectual property right is alleged to be in violation of the antitrust laws in connection with the marketing or distribution of a product or service protected by such a right, such right shall not be presumed to define a market or to establish market power, including economic power and product uniqueness or distinctiveness, or monopoly power.

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "antitrust laws" has the meaning given it in subsection (a) of the first section of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 12(a)); and

(2) the term "intellectual property right" means a right, title, or interest—

(A) in subject matter patented under title 35 of the United States Code, or

(B) in a work, including a mask work, protected under title 17 of the United States Code.●

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to once again join with Senator LEAHY in introducing legislation which will improve U.S. competitiveness and benefit U.S. consumers by promoting technological innovation. The Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989 is a necessary element of our efforts to provide U.S. companies the environment they need to stay competitive in world markets, an endeavor of increasing importance as we approach the 21st century. This act strengthens the ability of American companies to compete in the international high technology market. It will encourage innovation by permitting small inventors and entrepreneurs to recover their tremendous investment in research and development.

This act was introduced in response to judicial decisions which created uncertainty in the high technology community by invalidating licensing practices which had no anticompetitive effects. These decisions failed to consider all competitive effects of agreements involving intellectual property rights. Such decisions subject American companies to possible treble damage liability for normal competitive practices which have not adverse effects upon the consumer. Needless to say, that discourages technological innovation at the very time we critically need to encourage it. This act will send a reliable signal to inventors and entrepreneurs that courts will no longer needlessly discourage technological innovation in this manner.

The judicial decisions to which I refer reflected a tension between the antitrust laws and the intellectual property laws. By recognizing intellectual innovations as property, the intellectual property laws provide inventors, authors, artists, and other creators, with exclusive rights to the use of their inventions and creations for a limited time. These rights enable innovators to capture some of the economic rewards of their efforts. The antitrust laws, on the other hand, protect consumers and businesses by ensuring open and competitive markets. They prevent combinations in restraint of trade and accumulation of monopoly power. Their goal is to preserve for the benefit of consumers a truly free market.

The intellectual property laws appropriately concentrate economic power, in very limited spheres, in the hands of one individual to reward him for his efforts. The antitrust laws are intended to keep economic power dispersed.

Many courts have presumed the requisite market power for antitrust liability from the mere existence of a patent or copyright. However, mere possession of a patent or copyright hardly constitutes an automatic grant of monopoly power. In fact, quite the opposite is often the case: The recipient of a new patent may be intending to challenge existing participants in an established market. The mistaken characterization of intellectual property rights as automatically granting power over a particular market has led to unnecessarily harsh treatment of patents and copyrights in some antitrust cases.

Mr. President, we must not let the antitrust laws and intellectual property laws work at cross purposes. This legislation would lessen the tension between them by continuing to ban practices shown to be anticompetitive under an analysis of all competitive conditions. But importantly, this legislation would prevent courts from invalidating practices which do not have anticompetitive consequences—and which, in fact, are procompetitive because they encourage the development of intellectual property. Specifically, this act provides that when the holder of an intellectual property right is alleged to violate antitrust laws, the intellectual property right itself shall not be presumed to define a market or establish market power.

This legislation requires that agreements to convey intellectual property rights be evaluated for antitrust purposes upon consideration of all relevant economic factors, including their procompetitive benefits, rather than upon unwarranted presumptions of market power. This is an eminently reasonable step. The threat of antitrust liability acts as a disincentive to the creation and distribution of new technology. Even after new technology has been created and distributed, the threat of antitrust liability diverts resources away from further innovation. The status quo is clearly harmful to innovation without being beneficial to consumers. The elimination of the presumption will require only that courts evaluate practices involving intellectual property rights under the same antitrust principles that are applied to practices involving other forms of property.

Mr. President, this clarification of our antitrust laws will help American high-technology companies to compete effectively in the highly competitive international marketplace. I am therefore pleased to be offering this important piece of legislation with Senator LEAHY today and hope that its introduction will lead to its early consideration in the 101st Congress.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in introducing the Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989. This legislation, which passed the Senate last year, is an important step in clarifying the treatment of intellectual property rights under the antitrust laws. I commend Senator LEAHY, Senator HATCH, and my other colleagues on the Judiciary Committee for their hard work on this legislation.

Under current law, courts have presumed that holders of a patent, copyright, or semiconductor chip design have the market power necessary for antitrust liability. The decisions by these courts have, according to several witnesses who testified at the October 20, 1987, hearing, created uncertainty in the intellectual property community and have gone so far as to even deter American inventors—large and small, corporate and individual—from developing and marketing new technologies. I believe that by eliminating the market power presumption, the bill will serve to encourage this development and marketing, which is so important in our ever-expanding technological world.

It is important to emphasize that this bill does not create any kind of exemption from liability under the antitrust laws. Rather, it would simply require the courts to review intellectual property rights pursuant to the same antitrust principles that the courts apply to other kinds of property rights.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act of 1989 with my distinguished colleague, Senator LEAHY. This important legislation was overwhelmingly supported by the Senate in the 100th Congress, and I hope will receive similar support in this Congress.

Very simply, this bill clarifies the treatment of intellectual property rights under the antitrust laws. It provides that an intellectual property right will not be presumed to define a market or to establish market power whenever the conduct of a owner, licensor, licensee, or other holder is alleged to have violated the antitrust laws in connection with the marketing or distribution of a product or service protected by such a right.

This clarification is long overdue. The denial of certiorari by the Supreme Court in Digidyne Corp. v. Data General Corp., 734 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 908 (1985), and the Court's earlier decision in Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2 (1984), compel us to address the treatment of intellectual property rights under the antitrust laws. As was noted by Justice White in his dissent in Data General, by denying certiorari, the Court refused to address, and thus left unclear, what effect should be given to a copyright or other legal monopoly in determining market power. Justice White continued:

> At stake is more than the resolution of this single controversy or even the clarification of what may seem to be a collection of arcane legal distinctions. In the highly competitive, multibillion-dollar-a-year computer industry, bundling of software and hardware, or of operating systems and central processing units, is somewhat common, and any differentiated product is especially attractive to some buyers. The reach of the decision in this case is potentially enormous * * *.

Mr. President, many commentators have felt that it is inaccurate and unduly harsh to presume the holder of a patent or other intellectual property right automatically possesses market power. I agree. This bill, in clarifying the treatment of intellectual property in antitrust cases, strikes a healthy balance between the policies of antitrust enforcement and the policies underlying intellectual property rights.

It does not prevent a finding of market power where appropriate, but merely prohibits courts from presuming market power without proof that it exists.

In this time, Mr. President, when there is so much attention focused on the competitiveness of U.S. products, I believe that enactment of this legislation and removal of unwarranted antitrust concerns will also greatly encourage the marketing of new products, and will ultimately enhance our worldwide competitiveness. I would encourage all my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator LEAHY and my other colleagues in cosponsoring the Intellectual Property Antitrust Protection Act.

This legislation can play an important role in our efforts to encourage innovation and competitiveness in critical areas of business dependent upon intellectual property rights. It will provide an important clarification to our antitrust laws which will allow the courts to respond to economic realities and genuine principles of competition in applying the antitrust laws. This bill is especially important to American businesses which make substantial investments in research and development to produce innovative applications in such fields as computer software technology.

Although the reforms incorporated in this bill are limited in scope, they are of significant importance. The bill eliminates the presumption of market power which has been applied in cases where an antitrust claim is alleged against the holder of an intellectual property right. This presumption of market power in cases involving patented or copyrighted products amounts to a judicial shortcut for imposing antitrust liability. It has resulted in unreasonably harsh treatment of companies exercising such intellectual property rights in connection with their marketing, distribution, and licensing of their products or services.

This erroneous presumption of market power derives from the confusion of the exclusive legal rights granted by law to copyright and patent owners with the economic monopolies addressed by the antitrust laws. But the simple fact is that mere ownership of a patent or copyright does not convey market power. The presumption wholly fails to account for such factors as the relative demand for the protected product or the substitutability of competing products.

This legislation will do much to encourage innovation in the critical "high tech" fields which are such a major part of our economy. It was the subject of thorough hearings during the 100th Congress and favorably reported out by the Senate Judiciary Committee. This bill has been carefully crafted and revised and represents a thoughtful legislative product. I am especially pleased to note that it enjoys broad bipartisan support from members of both parties on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

I look forward to prompt action on this bill by the Judiciary Committee, and I urge my colleagues to support this useful legislation.

By Mr. LEAHY:

S. 272. A bill to eliminate the exemption from Congress from the application of certain provisions of Federal law relating to employment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN CONGRESS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, last year we all heard the news stories about Dickensian working conditions suffered by some of our employees. We all heard, for example, that some House folding room workers were putting in 70-hour weeks without receiving overtime pay. The blame for this outrage lays right here with ourselves. By exempting itself from important civil rights and labor laws, Congress has denied to the men and women who serve us every day here on Capitol Hill the rights and protections of other American workers.

This embarrassing situation has to change. It is time for Congress to reform the double standard we have applied to our workers. It is to this end that I am today introducing for the sixth time the Fair Employment in Congress Act.

The bill's purpose is simple. It removes the congressional exemption from each of the following laws: the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, the Civil Service Reform Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Equal Pay Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Occupational Safety and Health Act, and the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

Removing congressional exemptions from these laws would make Congress subject to the same restrictions upon employment and discrimination which apply to the rest of the country.

While the House has already amended its rules to make accommodations on these points, and the Senate will probably consider a similar proposal this year, there would be no need for rule changes if we in Congress made this the year of real reform. I know that other Members of Congress have ideas and proposals for "cleaning house"—and I am open to suggestions on ways to improve my bill. I have instructed my staff to study the options available to us. They will work with other interested staff members to come up with alternative routes for action. But we must not allow the double standard to continue.

I realize that in previous years, Congress has not acted upon this legislation. While I would like to see adoption of the principles outlined in my bill, I am most concerned that this effort provides a constructive vehicle for debate and discussion. I am hopeful that we can hold hearings on my bill. I would like us to work together to end the disparity and to bring fairness and equity to the people who serve us faithfully every day.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. WILSON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. BOND, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. COHEN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. BURDICK, and Mrs. KASSEBAUM):

S. 273. A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to designate as nonmailable matter solicitations of donations which should reasonably be misconstrued as a bill, invoice, or statement of account due, solicitations for the purchase of products or services which are provided either free of charge or at a lower price by the Federal Government connection or endorsement, unless such matter contains an appropriate, conspicuous disclaimer, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DECEPTIVE MAILINGS PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise on behalf of myself, Senator PRYOR, and 10 other cosponsors to introduce a bill to end deceptive mailing practices that have confused and preyed upon millions of older Americans and others by posing as official Government mailings.

This bill is similar to legislation that passed the House last year, but fell victim to our crowded year-end calendar in the Senate. It is a draft that reflects months of negotiations and compromise that took place last year among the various congressional committees of jurisdiction and a number of other interested parties. It is not, however, the final version. There are a few provisions that were important to some of the participants in that negotiation that we have left out for purposes of introducing the bill. It is my hope that this legislation can be the subject of hearings in the Government Affairs Committee early in the year, and that in a committee markup soon thereafter we will be able to resolve the remaining concerns.

Mr. President, this legislation addresses concerns that have been growing in the Congress in recent years about a few unscrupulous mass mail operators who have targeted elderly Americans with solicitations carefully designed to make money by implying Federal Government involvement with their product or service. These deceptive mailings use a combination of official-sounding organization names, symbols such as American eagles, envelopes similar in size and color to official Government mailings, frightening language, and the lack of information that many Americans have about Federal programs in order to cheat the recipients out of money. Many sell a service that is already available free of charge from the Federal Government, such as providing the forms that allow beneficiaries to check that all earnings have been properly posted to their Social Security account.

Complaints about this type of mail have been coming in to the Postal Service—and to congressional offices—with growing frequency. A senior citizen from Arizona was confused by an offer she received to participate in a "Social Security sweepstakes." She asks, "Since when has Social Security been in the 'gambling business'?" A minister from Iowa writes of one elderly parishioner, living on $385 per month, who often sent money in response to what seemed to be bills from various Government agencies, "Because she has sent $5, $10, or $25 in response to some of these requests, she seems to be on a myriad of mailing lists. She is easily confused, and responds out of fear of losing what little she has. While she is less able to sort out the source and the necessity for responding than some, I believe there are thousands of older people like her who are being victimized." After being inundated with constant requests for money to save the Social Security system, one of my own constituents from Pennsylvania complained, "You might as well shoot old people as worry them to death."

The bill that I am introducing today will put an end to these deceptive practices by expanding the post office's authority to stop delivery of certain materials (39 U.S.C. 3001, et. al.). This statutory authority protects consumers by designating certain items—such as solicitations for the sale of goods or services which are designed to look like bills or invoices—as "nonmailable." When the post office discovers such nonmailable items, it is empowered to stop delivery of consumer replies to the advertising, cutting off profits from the venture immediately. Additionally, this law gives the post office the authority to forbid payment of any postal notes or money orders to the organization of the scheme, and require that the individual or organization cease and desist from engaging in such schemes in the future. Violations of cease-and-desist orders carry stiff monetary penalties. My amendment would add several catagories of "nonmailable" materials to those which the post office already has the authority to stop.

First, the amendment would prohibit look-alike Federal mailings which are actually solicitations for the sale of goods or services. Those organizations which try to make a sale by giving the false impression that they are somehow affiliated with the Federal Government—through contrivances such as official-sounding names, seals and insignias similar to those used by Federal agencies, or even the words "Buy and Hold U.S. Savings Bonds" on the back of tan envelopes that look very much like those containing U.S. Treasury checks—will now be required to place conspicuous disclaimers on their solicitations and envelopes. I note here that this provision covers solicitations for any products or services—not just those which may be available from the Government—which deceive consumers into believing that the offeror has some special relationship with the Federal Government. Our intent in drafting the measure in this manner is twofold: First, we intend to require disclaimers on deceptive mailings which sell products or services that may not be available from the Government, yet seem to have some connection; for example, Social Security "lotteries," Medicare supplemental insurance, and so forth, as well as those that are available from the Government; for example, the forms to file a name change with SSA. Second, we do not intend to restrict the sale of products or services which may be available from the Government, but which are being sold by a nongovernment entity without any deception as to the identity of the seller; for example, copies of Federal statutes or regulations, informational reports on the activities of Federal agencies, and so forth). Only those solicitations which use deceptive tactics and fail to display the proper disclaimers will be deemed "nonmailable" under this legislation.

Similarly, solicitations for contributions or membership fees which employ Federal Government look-alike deceptive practices will be deemed "nonmailable." Because deceptive solicitations for donations are often slick scams which use scare tactics targeted at vulnerable consumers who depend on programs such as Social Security and Medicare to meet their daily needs, this bill makes "nonmailable" those solicitations which mention specific programs or agencies in such a manner as to imply that the organization is somehow affiliated with the Federal Government where no such connection, approval or endorsement actually exists. Solicitations which request a monetary donation to ensure the solvency of the Social Security system would be covered by this provision, but it would not apply to those solicitations which mention Federal programs or agencies but do not do so in a way which improperly implies an affiliation with the Federal Government.

This legislation recognizes that there are independent publications such as magazines or newspapers which may contain advertisements by third parties which are deceptive in nature. While Congress in no way wishes to discourage these publishers from checking into the legitimacy of advertisements which they accept, we recognize that publishers do not always have direct control over the content of independent advertisements. Consequently, this bill does not require discloses on publications such as magazines or newspapers which contain deceptive advertising. However, advertisments made by these publishers in their own publications do not fall under this exemption. I note that the publishers exception does not apply to publishers which have any commercial interest in a deceptive advertisement, including any commercial interest in the entity placing the ad.

In closing, I look forward to working with Senator PRYOR, who is joining with me in introducing this bill and is the chairman of the Subcommittee on Federal Services, Post Office and Civil Service where this bill will be considered. Mr. President, those organizations which use deceptive mailings to prey upon the elderly are slick operators, and we need to make sure that we use every avenue available to us to stop them. I hope we will be able to move quickly to wrap up our considerable work from last year and enact these important protections for older Americans.

I ask unanimous consent that the section-by-section analysis and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1: Short Title—Deceptive Mailings Prevention Act of 1989.

Section 2: Amendments to Title 39, United States Code.

(a) PROHIBITION OF DECEPTIVE MAILINGS.—creates two new catagories of "nonmailable" matter:

SOLICITATIONS MISREPRESENTING A FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AFFILIATION

Funds for Products or Services: The first—new section "(f)"—Postal carriers have the authority to hold any piece of mail used to solicit funds for a product or service that uses seals, symbols or other means to imply some connection or endorsement of the Federal Government (where no such relationship exists). This type of solicitation is "nonmailable" unless it has a notice on its face which says "This product or service has not been approved or endorsed by the Federal Government, and this offer is not being made by an agency of the Federal Government." (or a similar disclaimer), and a notice on the envelope which says "This is not a Government document".

Contributions for Membership Fees: The second—new section "(g)"—requires similar disclaimers on solicitation of contributions or membership fees whose advertising uses seals symbols or other means or mention of a federal program or agency to imply some connection or endorsement of the Federal Government (where no such relationship exists). This type of mail is "nonmailable" unless it has a conspicuous notice on its face, as well.

Note: Under both the new sections "(f)" and "(g)", publishers of newspapers and magazines are not responsible for placing disclaimers on the front of their publications regarding the advertisements in their publication unless the solicitation is on the behalf of that publication.

(b) ENFORCEMENT PROVISION.—Amends Section 3005 of the code, the enforcement section, to include violations of these new "nonmailable" catagories. When it finds these violations, the Postal Service is authorized to stop delivery of any of the responses (including payments) from consumers to the fraudulent scheme and begin an investigation to determine if the misleading mail is illegal or fraudulent.

Section 3: Effective Date. This law will apply to all mail deposited 180 days after enactment.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Deceptive Mailings Prevention Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. AMENDMENTS TO TITLE 39.

(a) PROHIBITION OF DECEPTIVE MAILINGS.—Section 3001 of title 39, United States Code is amended by redesignating subsections (f) and (g) as subsections (i) and (j); respectively, and by inserting after subsection (e) the following:

"(f) Matter otherwise legally acceptable in the mails which constitutes a solicitation by a nongovernmental entity for the purchase of or payment for a product or service; and contains a seal, insignia, trade or brand name, or any other term, symbol, design, or device which resembles a seal, insignia, trade or brand name, or any other term, symbol, design, or device that reasonably could be interpreted or construed as implying any Federal Government connection, approval or endorsement in such a manner that may cause confusion, mistake, or deception (unless such nongovernmental entity has such expressed connection, approval or endorsement) is nonmailable matter and shall not be carried or delivered by mail, and shall be disposed of as the Postal Service directs, unless—

"(1)(A) such matter bears on its face, in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, or color with other printing on its face, in accordance with regulations which the Postal Service shall prescribe, the following notice: 'THIS PRODUCT OR SERVICE HAS NOT BEEN APPROVED OR ENDORSED BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, AND THIS OFFER IS NOT BEING MADE BY AN AGENCY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.', or a notice to the same effect in words which the Postal Service may prescribe; and

"(B) the envelope or outside cover or wrapper in which such matter is mailed bears on its face in capital letters and in conspicuous and legible type, in accordance with regulations which the Postal Service shall prescribe, the following notice: 'THIS IS NOT A GOVERNMENT DOCUMENT.', or a notice to the same effect in words which the Postal Service may prescribe; or

"(2) such matter is contained in a publication for which the addressee has paid or promised to pay a consideration or which he has otherwise indicated he desires to receive, except that this paragraph shall not apply if the solicitation is on behalf of the publisher of the publication.

"(g) Matter otherwise legally acceptable in the mails which constitutes a solicitation by a nongovernmental entity for the contribution of funds or membership fees and;

"(1) contains a seal, insignia, trade or brand name, or any other term, symbol, design, or device which resembles a seal, insignia, trade or brand name, or any other term, symbol, design, or device that reasonably could be interpreted or construed as implying any Federal Government connection, approval or endorsement in such manner that may cause confusion, mistake, or deception (unless such nongovernmental entity has such expressed connection, approval or endorsement) or

"(2) mentions by name or implication any department, agency, bureau, board, office, administration, service, system, program or other division or subdivision of the Federal Government in such a manner which reasonably could be interpreted or construed as implying any Federal Government connection, approval, or endorsement in such a manner that may cause confusion, mistake, or deception (unless such nongovernmental entity has such expressed connection, approval or endorsement); is nonmailable matter and shall not be carried or delivered by mail, and shall be disposed of as the Postal Service directs, unless—

"(3)(A) such matter bears on its face, in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, or color with other printing on its face, in accordance with regulations which the Postal Service shall prescribe, the following notice: 'THIS ORGANIZATION HAS NOT BEEN APPROVED OR ENDORSED BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, AND THIS OFFER IS NOT BEING MADE BY AN AGENCY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.', or a notice to the same effect in words which the Postal Service may prescribe; and

"(B) the envelope or outside cover or wrapper in which such matter is mailed bears on its face in capital letters and in conspicuous and legible type, in accordance with regulations which the Postal Service shall prescribe, the following notice: 'THIS IS NOT A GOVERNMENT DOCUMENT.', or a notice to the same effect in words which the Postal Service may prescribe; or

"(4) such matter is contained in a publication for which the addressee has paid or promised to pay a consideration or which he has otherwise indicated he desires to receive, except that this paragraph shall not apply if the solicitation is on behalf of the publisher of the publication.

(b) DECEPTIVE MAILINGS AS FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.—Section 3005(a) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by striking out "section 3001(d)" each place that it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "section 3001 (d), (f), or (g)".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to matter deposited for mailing and delivery on or after the 180th day after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. SASSER (for himself, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. KERRY, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. INOUYE, and Mr. PELL):

S. 274. A bill to amend chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, to allow members of the Armed Forces to sue the United States for damages for certain injuries caused by improper medical care provided during peacetime; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MILITARY MEDICAL MALPRACTICE

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, some time ago, I learned about several cases of medical malpractice involving active duty military personnel from my State. While investigating these cases, I discovered serious flaws in the military medical system.

I found that the Feres doctrine—a 1950 Supreme Court decision—bars active-duty personnel from filing medical malpractice suits against the Government. In other words, a person serving on active-duty in peacetime can be subject to grossly negligent medical malpractice by those hired by the Government to maintain his physical health and well-being—yet he cannot seek redress in the courts of this land or in the courts of the military. While the prohibition against active duty military personnel suing the Government has been upheld by the courts, they have permitted nonactive duty personnel, military retirees, and the dependents of military personnel to sue for damages incurred in medical malpractice cases. This struck me as singularly unfair. In effect, this doctrine relegates our active duty military personnel to the status of second class citizens.

In order to remedy this inequity, I introduced legislation in both the 99th Congress and the 100th Congress that gives active-duty personnel the right to file medical malpractice suits against the Government in peacetime.

For these reasons, I am again introducing this legislation. An identical bill has passed the House by overwhelming margins during the last two Congresses, and I expect it to do so again. I hope that the Senate will also act quickly on the bill. It is time we in Congress restored our military personnel to the status they properly deserve.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. SYMMS:

S. 275. A bill to provide that the only pay increase to Members of Congress shall be as pay bonuses if a budget surplus exists at the end of each fiscal year, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

BALANCED BUDGET BONUS ACT FOR 1989

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that I believe is an equitable resolution of the contentious issue of congressional pay. My bill, the Balanced Budget Bonus Act of 1989, would remove congressional pay from the purview of the National Commission on Salaries and provide an increase in Members' compensation only in a fiscal year when the Office of Management and Budget reports a budget surplus.

Under this bill, Members' base pay rate would remain at $89,500 unless an increase is approved by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress. However, if the Director of OMB determines that a budget surplus exists at the end of a fiscal year, Members would receive a bonus of 25 percent of their base pay. In any subsequent fiscal year that a budget surplus exists, Members would receive a 50-percent bonus. The bill limits the total compensation of annual pay plus bonuses to $135,000.

This issue arises, as all of us know, because of National Salary Commission's recent recommendation of substantial salary increases for Members of Congress, and top level executive and judicial branch officers. In late December, I wrote the President, urging him not to propose the Commission's recommended $45,000 pay raise for Members of Congress. A Congress that allows the national debt to grow from $914 billion in 1980 to almost $3 trillion in 1988 should not be rewarded with substantial pay increase that will only add to that burgeoning deficit.

Notwithstanding my advice, President Reagan adopted in full the recommendations of the Salary Commission, and if Congress fails to disapprove his proposal by February 8, the pay increase will take effect automatically. I believe that would be a public policy mistake and a political disaster for many Members of Congress. The Balanced Budget Bonus Act is an alternative approach that would allow Members to be rewarded for a job well done on the key issue of our time—eliminating the budget deficit.

The people of Idaho—and, I believe, the vast majority of Americans—are saying, "Read our lips: no pay raise." I hope my colleagues will read those lips and join me in supporting this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill and my letter to the President be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, December 27, 1988.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I understand you are reviewing the Federal Salary Commission recommendation to increase the salaries of top federal officials and will send your pay proposal to the Hill in early January.

While the recommended $45,000 pay raise for Members of Congress sounds attractive to most on Capitol Hill, I have conducted an un-scientific, but quite reliable, poll of voters in Idaho and they are saying, "Read our lips: no pay raise!" I think it's a mandate, backed by some sound reasoning.

Three times in this decade, the American people have voted in Presidential elections for less government and a strong commitment to freedom at home and abroad, two powerful principles of the Reagan Revolution. How many taxpayers would say that Congress has demonstrated its commitment to those same principles and is, therefore, deserving of monetary reward?

We ended fiscal year 1980 with a national debt of $914.3 billion and eight years later, fiscal year 1988 came to a close with a national debt edging toward $3 trillion. How many financial managers in corporate America would be looking for a bonus in their Christmas stocking after showing results like that at the annual Board meeting? As President, you often get blamed for the high deficits, but we both know which end of Pennsylvania Avenue holds the purse strings.

What has Congress done to demonstrate its commitment to freedom? Thank God it didn't require a consensus in Congress to decide whether we ought to send troops to Grenada to protect the American students there. How much hope can we offer the people of Nicaragua that they will one day be freed from the yoke of Ortega's Marxist dictatorship? How many Nicaraguan freedom fighters would say this Congress deserves overtime pay for its resolute support of freedom in our own backyard?

Mr. President, if you propose merit pay increases, rather than cost-of-living adjustments, I believe you'll propose no pay raise for the liberal controlled Congress.

That's a message the American people would applaud and even the "gutless, no good" Congress would understand.

How about a fair compromise. Tell the Congress any pay raise will come only from a budget surplus.

Respectfully,

STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senator.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. REID, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. DODD, Mr. PELL, Mr. KERRY, Mr. GORE, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 276. A bill to establish a Department of Environmental Protection; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am joining with several of our colleagues to introduce a bill to elevate the Environmental Protection Agency to the President's Cabinet.

This is a simple bill. It takes what is now an executive branch agency created by President Nixon in 1970 and makes it a cabinet department headed by a Secretary of Environmental Protection.

The central issue here is the relationship between the President of the United States and the head of our Federal agency for environmental protection. Under the existing structure that is not a close relationship. The President is not directly involved in making environmental policy. The Administrator of EPA does not have direct and frequent access to the President. And EPA is not involved in the Cabinet decisions which set the broad policies for our Nation. That needs to be changed.

A second concern is the relationship between the environmental agency and the other Cabinet departments. Some of our worst polluters—unfortunately—are agencies and departments of the U.S. Government. We have big problems with hazardous waste sites at Defense and Energy facilities. And we have just learned that it will cost the Department of Energy $5 to $9 billion and several years of effort to come into compliance with current environmental regulations. EPA needs to be on an equal footing with those departments as the cleanup efforts at Federal facilities are designed and carried out.

And a third issue is the growing environmental aspect of international relations. We will increasingly see agreements like that recently signed to protect the ozone layer which reflect an international commitment to solve global environmental problems. Many of our most difficult environmental problems—air pollution, global warming, and marine protection—can only be dealt with in the international context. We are encouraged by the strong role that the United States took in developing the ozone protocol and believe that American leadership can be enhanced, if our environmental agency has Cabinet rank.

The bill does not change the basic structure, policy, or duties of EPA. It just elevates the function to Cabinet rank. Each of the current officers would have a counterpart in the new Department. We are not proposing to transfer any functions from other agencies over to this new entity.

There is one modest departure from current arrangements suggested in this bill. There are now nine Assistant Administrators at EPA which have duties ranging from the regulation of air pollution to the administration of external affairs. There would be nine Assistant Secretaries, if this bill were adopted, with much the same distribution of assignments. But the bill does suggest that the international environmental affairs function be given more priority and assigned one of the Assistant Secretary slots—a status not available to that office currently. This is in keeping with the increasing role that international activities will play in the Department's agenda.

Mr. President, there is broad support for this legislation. I believe all of the former EPA Administrators, both Democrat and Republican, support elevation to the Cabinet. This move was one of the principal recommendations in "Blueprint for the Environment" an agenda for the new Bush administration put forward by the Nation's major environmental groups. A companion bill has already been introduced on the House side by Congressman FLORIO. And the bill we introduce today has broad bipartisan support here in the Senate. The distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Environment and Public Works Committee, Mr. BURDICK and Mr. CHAFEE, are cosponsors. The distinguished ranking member of the Agriculture Committee, Mr. LUGAR, is a cosponsor. His committee has jurisdiction over the pesticide programs at EPA. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], both of whom have been active on the global warming issue, are cosponsors. So there is broad, bipartisan support for this proposal.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD along with my comments today.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I am happy to join my colleagues as an original cosponsor of legislation which will add the Environmental Protection Agency to the President's Cabinet. Cabinet level status for EPA is long overdue and it is imperative if this country is to meet a growing list of environmental challenges in the 1990's and beyond.

In the two decades since the creation of the Environmental Protection Agency there has been bipartisan and consistent public support for a broad array of programs designed to protect our environment and public health. We have made great strides in improving the quality of our environment since EPA was created under an executive branch reorganization in 1970. In many respects, we have completed the easy initial tasks concerning environmental protection. However, our emerging environmental concerns are more complex, interrelated and increasingly, global in nature. The greenhouse effect, toxic contamination of our water, air and ground water, stratospheric ozone depletion, and disposal of our solid and hazardous waste are all major issues looming on the horizon.

Paradoxically, the eventual solutions to these problems are vastly more dependent upon decisions made by each of us individually. Unlike simpler times, we now know that the collective actions of individuals have a direct and significant bearing on our global environment. Over the past two decades we have learned that our environmental problems will not be solved simply by enacting legislation. The environmental problems confronting us today are much more pervasive, insidious and less conducive to unilateral action.

The President has observed on more than one occasion that the Cabinet room in the White House is getting full. I tend to agree with that assessment but there is ample room at the table to permit a full discussion of domestic and international environmental issues and the environmental consequences of executive branch decisions. As the need for greater international cooperation on environmental issues becomes more urgent, Cabinet status should be accorded the agency. It simply makes good sense to have this Nation's chief environmental officer sit at the table, on an equal footing, with other Cabinet members as national and international policies and strategies are developed. Certainly concern for the global environment will enable us to project a kinder and gentler image to a world increasingly concerned about these vital issues. Other countries have for years given their environmental executive ministerial status. We should do no less.

Under this bill the new Department of Environmental Protection would have the same structure of the existing agency. Nothing in the bill would change the vital mission or significant work of the Council on Environmental Quality.

Departmental status for EPA is worthy of Senate action. I am pleased to lend my support to this legislation. I hope that it will become law during the 101st Congress.

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of legislation which will elevate the Environmental Protection Agency to a Cabinet-level position and create a new Department of the Environment.

The year 1988 will be remembered as a year that the public expressed a renewed interest in the environment. Major magazines such as Time and Newsweek carried cover stories on the state of planet Earth and the environmental problems that plague us. News reports were filled with stories of medical waste washing ashore on our beaches, sludge being dumped in our oceans, landfills filling to capacity, smog polluting our cities and acid rain destroying our lakes and forests. Protecting the environment must become a top priority in the new administration of George Bush. Giving the EPA equal clout with other Cabinet-level posts will demonstrate this Nation's commitment to cleaning up our environment.

The EPA is currently responsible for administrating some of this Nation's most comprehensive and costly laws and programs—Superfund, Clean Air Act, Clean Water Act, and the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act.

The drought of this past summer turned this Nation's attention to the phenomenon of the greenhouse effect and global warming. The degradation of the Earth's ozone layer also received a great deal of attention last year. Problems such as these do not only affect us here in the United States—they are global in scope. A Cabinet-level environmental official will have better standing among his colleagues from other nations when negotiating various environmental treaties.

It is imperative that the environment be on the national agenda. We have made great strides since 1970 when the EPA was first created by President Nixon. Creation of a Department of the Environment will give the environment the attention it deserves. I urge my colleagues to act on this legislation.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of the Department of Environmental Protection Act of 1989. This bill redesignates the Environment Protection Agency as an executive department in the executive branch of the U.S. Government. The present Administrator-designate, William Reilly, may well have the distinction of being the first Cabinet level Secretary of Environmental Protection.

Mr. President, my distinguished colleagues and I can be persuasive concerning issues held close to our hearts. I suppose the argument could be made that the only factor limiting the size of the Cabinet is the size of the Cabinet table. At present there are 14 executive departments with Cabinet status and EPA is one of more than 20 independent agencies, albeit the largest, that conceivably could be considered for the Cabinet.

Mr. President, the Cabinet, its function and history are unique. The question of whether a President should have a Cabinet was a leading issue at the Constitutional Convention. After great deliberation, Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, established four executive offices: a Department of War, a Department of Foreign Affairs, a Department of Finance, and a Department of Marine. Later, during the drafting of the Constitution, George Mason, Benjamin Franklin, and others attempted to establish provisions within the Constitution for advisers to the President. In the end, the Constitution was signed with sparse prescriptions pertinent to the question.

How fitting that 200 years ago, in 1789, Congress created the first three executive departments under our present Constitution: the Departments of State, War, and Treasury. It was President George Washington who gave credence to the parameters of a Cabinet. The Constitution was meager in its direction on the matter of a Cabinet, and allowed Washington to do as he saw fit. In doing so, President Washington chose his Cabinet members on the basis of talent, without regard to political predisposition. Disastrous. And I may add, not attempted again. And so, every President on down has placed in his Cabinet individuals whose counsel is in line with his own general thinking. If a counter position is needed, why, of course, the President can always turn to Congress where such opinions abound.

Little surprise that the Cabinet, whose very existence is largely based on custom, has assumed many distinct roles under different Presidents. And so, the question as to why we are attempting to elevate the Environmental Protection Agency to one of Cabinet status must be based on the notion that Government's commitment to an issue is in certain part reflected in the status given to the institution responsible for that issue. Mr. President, clearly this bill does not attempt any major reorganization, nor does it widen the scope of activity allotted to protection of our environment.

What it will do is place the protection of our environment on the same footing as matters under the jurisdiction of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, Agriculture, Justice, Commerce, Labor, Defense, Housing and Urban Development, Transportation, Energy, Education, Health and Human Services, and Veterans Affairs. And why not? Hopefully, this measure will give our new Secretary the influence needed to obtain an adequate budget for the quiet but constant battle he faces. Yes, Mr. President, to a certain extent I believe it is a battle, or perhaps a war of attrition, and one I fear we may be losing. In 1988 EPA's workload was twice that of 1981, yet its purchasing power was the same as in 1975. Inadequate, to say the least. A record we can improve on.

And so, Mr. President, I hope this can be a signal of our priorities. This should help to make it clear that protection of the environment is not a minor matter. The Cabinet periodically has been altered as events have warranted. The situation we face concerning the environment is one such event.●

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator DURENBERGER in introducing legislation to make the Environmental Protection Agency a Cabinent-level department. The Department of Environmental Protection is an idea whose time has come. It will help us to address the critical environmental problems we face.

Mr. President, the start of a new administration is a time of hope, enthusiasm, optimism, and renewal of commitment. And a time to meet the challenges of the future. We face no greater challenge over the next few years than in restoring the integrity of our environment.

We have seen the results of 8 years of neglect: oceans too dirty to swim in and too polluted for fish to live in; water too toxic to drink; air too dirty to breath; rain too acidic for trees to grow, and land too contaminated to ensure the health of our citizens.

And these problems are becoming global in nature. Destruction of rain forests in South America, air pollution in Europe, use of CFC's in Japan, extinction of species in Africa, and wasteful energy practices in the United States affect citizens in other parts of the globe.

Elevation of EPA to Cabinet-level status would serve two important functions.

First, it would be symbolic of a new commitment to protect the environment. It would demonstrate to the people in the United States and to other nations that the United States puts a high priority on preserving the environment and enhancing the public health and welfare.

After all, as Jay Hair of the National Wildlife Federation recently wrote, "The Nation's quality of life is determined more directly by EPA than by any other Cabinet-level Department."

Second, and more importantly, it will enhance the ability of EPA to do its job.

It will give EPA increased clout in: obtaining necessary funding; working with other Departments whose actions affect the environment; making national policy decisions, and dealing with other nations who send Cabinet-level ministers to meetings to discuss environmental issues.

I believe that we can meet the environmental challenges we face. Making EPA a Cabinet-level department in and of itself is not enough. We need more funding, tougher enforcement, and stronger leadership. Over the last 8 years, we've had a kinder and gentler EPA. Now we need a tougher, tenacious EPA.

But as we begin the new administration and renew our efforts to meet the environmental challenges of the future, I believe that creation of a Department of Environmental Protection is one action we must take.

I urge my colleagues to join Senator DURENBERGER and me in supporting this legislation.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues today to introduce this bill to elevate EPA to the President's Cabinet. We have a bipartisan group from both Houses introducing this legislation at the start of a new Congress and a new administration. It leads me to think that the prospects for this bill are good.

It is a time for reconsidering priorities. We can no longer afford to treat environmental protection as a second-class issue. It deserves the President's direct attention and will benefit greatly from his involvement through the Cabinet function.

I think President Bush has good instincts on the environment. It would be good for him to set an environmental agenda and play a bigger role than past Presidents.

All too often we have suffered long delays in responding to pressing environmental questions—in part because of political deadlock here in the Congress. Implementation of our environmental programs have sometimes been handicapped by inadequate funding, even after the Congress has enacted them. The President can make a difference in these areas. Putting EPA at the Cabinet table is one way to make sure that the President is fully informed on the problems and the opportunities.

EPA is already expected to deal with other Cabinet departments on an equal footing. For example, in the area of hazardous waste, Congress has charged EPA with the responsibility for ultimate oversight on the cleanup effort at Federal facilities. There are literally hundreds of these sites. It may cost billions over a long period to correct problems that the Federal Government has created. Assuring that EPA is an equal partner in fact, as well as in expectation, will assure that the cleanup job is thorough and timely.

The other reason I am committed to this bill is the growing role of environmental issues on the international agenda. Lee Thomas has done an excellent job leading the executive branch and the international community to agreements that will protect the ozone layer. But that job isn't completed altogether, and there are a host of other problems equally pressing that only the world community can effectively address.

The Administrator of EPA could be even more effective on these questions as the Secretary of the Environment. This function has ministerial rank in most of the rest of the developed world—and in most American States, for that matter—and it's time to take that step in our Federal Establishment, too.

Mr. President, I have every expectation that this legislation will be enacted in this Congress. It is a step that we can take quickly to signal a new priority for the environment. I am pleased with the bipartisan start that we are making and look forward to working with our colleagues on this and other environmental legislation in the new Congress.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

PROMOTION OF ADOPTION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am introducing a package of three bills which seek to advance the leadership of the Federal Government in the promotion of adoption. One bill in this package will make permanent a highly successful adoption benefits program for members of the armed services. The second will extend similar benefits to Federal civilian employees. The third bill seeks to increase incentives for the private sector to offer adoption benefits.

Since 1985, I have been working through the congressional coalition on adoption to remove barriers to adoption. One of the cruelest barriers to adoption is its considerable cost. Employers assist biological parents to meet the costs associated with childbirth by providing health insurance coverage for prenatal care and the expense of labor and delivery of the child. In the past, however, no assistance has been available through such employee benefit plans for adoptive parents.

Yet the costs of adoption are similar to those incurred by biological parents. In addition to paying agency fees—which typically include the costs of prenatal care for the birth mother, delivery, and the baby's care in the hospital—adoptive parents are often required to pay the cost of the baby's foster care from the time it is released from the hospital nursery until they take custody, as well as the expenses for preadoption and postadoption counseling, and legal fees.

The average total cost in 1985 for those who adopted through a nonprofit agency was $6,000. When transportation or other special fees are required, as in international adoptions, the cost may be even higher.

Fortunately, in recent years the public and private sector have begun to recognize the inequity of providing benefits for biological parents but not for adoptive parents. A growing number of corporations are establishing adoption benefit plans for their employees. State and local governments are also beginning to develop employee adoption assistance programs. The Congress too has begun to recognize this inequity.

Two years ago, Congress approved legislation I sponsored establishing a 2-year test program for reimbursement of adoption expenses incurred by members of the Armed Forces. The response from military families to this new program has been overwhelming. According to a survey conducted by the Department of Defense, 97 percent of those participating in the test said the adoption benefits program has improved their morale. Seventy-five percent of those surveyed said the existence of this program will be a determining factor in their reenlistment.

These preliminary results are very encouraging and point to the fact that we are now moving in the right direction. One of the bills I am proposing today will make the Armed Forces Adoption Benefits Program permanent. The legislation will provide limited reimbursement of up to $2,000 for adoption expenses incurred in an unrelated adoption. Qualifying adoption expenses include agency and placement fees, legal fees, medical expenses, expenses relating to pregnancy and childbirth for the biological mother, temporary foster care charges, and transportation expenses. The estimated cost is $2.8 million per year.

The second bill I am introducing mandates similar benefits for Federal employees. As the Nation's largest employer, the Federal Government should lead the way in encouraging profamily efforts such as adoption. Yet, we are lagging far behind many States and private employers who have made adoption benefit plans available to their employees.

The legislation I am proposing to establish a Federal employees adoption benefit plan is virtually identical to the military adoption program we are currently operating. Employees of the Federal Government would be provided a limited reimbursement of up to $2,000 for their adoption expenses. It is estimated that for the 2.7 million Federal civilian employees, 1,800 will adopt. Assuming all receive the maximum reimbursement, the estimated maximum cost of this program would only be $3.6 million annually.

This modest proposal will go a long way in bringing the Federal Government's employee benefits plans up to date with respect to adoption.

Throughout the United States, many public and private adoption agencies are reaching out to the corporate world to help increase public awareness of adoption as a wonderful way to build a family.

A growing number of corporations are responding by providing adoption leave and adoption benefits for their employees. An adoption benefits plan is a company-sponsored program that financially assists or reimburses employees for expenses related to adoption. Companies which offer such a benefit plan typically make it available for all kinds of adoptions—infants, special needs children, or children who are adopted from other countries.

Coverage varies widely, with benefits ranging from a few hundred dollars to up to $2,000.

Two factors, however, inhibit the availability and effectiveness of employer provided adoption benefits. First, the payments made to employees are taxable as income, thus reducing the effect of the benefit. Second, companies currently may not treat their contributions to adoption benefit plans as ordinary and necessary business expenses. This discourages many companies which would otherwise offer these benefits from doing so.

The third bill I am introducing today addresses these issues. It excludes from an employee's income adoption expenses paid by an employer and treats the employer's contribution to an adoption benefits plan as an ordinary and necessary business expense thus allowing the employer to deduct his contributions in the same way he deducts contributions to an employer-provided health insurance or retirement plan.

Mr. President, let me be clear. This legislation seeks to provide the same treatment under the Tax Code for adoptive births as is provided for biological births. That is its purpose. I am not asking that adoption benefits be given a special break, only that they be treated equally. Employees with a biological birth receive pregnancy benefits, adoptive parents receive no such benefits and often their expenses are larger. It is estimated that this bill will cost $13 million over 3 years.

Although the States have primary jurisdiction over adoption, the Federal Government does relate to adoption in a number of programs. Chief among these are the Adoption Opportunities Program established by the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act of 1978—Public Law 95-266)—the Adoption Assistance Program established by the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980—Public Law 96-272—and funding for adoption services under the Adolescent Family Life Act of 1981.

I personally believe that every employer should offer adoption benefits. Legislation providing limited reimbursement for adoption expenses to adoptive parents who are Federal employees and members of the Armed Forces will complement the Federal policy on adoption and further enhance the role of the Federal Government as a family-oriented employer.

I ask unanimous consent that the three bills be printed in the RECORD as follows:

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 1. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for women and men; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator PACKWOOD today, on behalf of myself and 49 other Senators, to reintroduce the equal rights amendment, and to reaffirm my strong commitment to making ERA part of the Constitution of the United States.

Earlier this month we began a new legislative session marked by the continuing commemoration of the Bicentennial of the Constitution, the creation of our Government and the adoption of our Bill of Rights.

It is an appropriate time to advance the noble values embodied in our founding document and make them a reality for all Americans. Although we can be proud of the strides we have made toward realizing these goals in the past 200 years, it is a national disgrace that equality for women is not yet enshrined in the Constitution.

Enactment and ratification of ERA is essential to ensure equality for women in both the law and the life of this land. The need for a constitutional guarantee of equal rights for all citizens remains compelling. Existing statutory prohibitions against sex discrimination have failed to give women basic educational and employment opportunities equal to men in our society. An unconscionable wage gap between the earnings of men and women persists in our work force. In 1987 women earned only 70 cents for every dollar earned by men. Women with college degrees continue to earn less than males who have not completed high school, and most working women are clustered in 20 occupations at the lower end of the pay scale.

Sex discrimination permeates many areas of the economy. For example, in 1960, 52 percent of all employed women were clerical workers, saleswomen, waitresses, and hairdressers; today, 46 percent of all working women can still be found in those same four occupations. In 1960, 5 percent of working women held managerial positions and 1 percent were in skilled craft jobs; today, 10 percent are managers and only 2 percent are skilled craft workers. The number of female professional and technical workers has increased from 12 percent in 1960 to 17.5 percent today, but more than half of these are still nurses and teachers.

Female-headed households continue to dominate the bottom rungs of the economic ladder. More women than ever before are in poverty. Of the more than 7 million families below the federally defined poverty threshold for a family of four—$11,611 in 1987—52 percent were headed by women. Nearly 60 percent of all minority female-headed households live below the poverty level, and 54 percent of all children who are poor live in such households. This dismal record of progress of equal justice for women reveals that much remains to be done.

Experience in past Congresses shows that the road to ratification will not be easy. But the extraordinary importance of the effort gives us the strength to persevere. With hard work, we can act in this Congress to approve the equal rights amendment, so that, as we commemorate the 200th anniversary of the Bill of Rights 2 years from now, ERA will at last have its rightful place in our Nation's founding document.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 1

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article in proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourth of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission by the Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SECTION 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

SECTION 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification."

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today with Senator KENNEDY to reintroduce the equal rights amendment in the 101st Congress.

For the last 200 years, the U.S. Constitution has been a respected symbol of freedom throughout the world. This noble experiment in freedom and liberty for all is unique in the history of the world. The principles embodied in the Constitution are revered by all Americans.

Despite the enormous contributions women have made to the development of this country; despite the tremendous progress women have made to achieve equal rights with men, women still do not receive equal protection under the Constitution. Even now, the legal rights of women in this country are not secured by our Nation's most important document. The inclusion of women in the U.S. Constitution through the equal rights amendment will provide women with a sound legal basis for remedying the inequities that exist between the treatment of men and women.

Right now, movement toward equal rights for women is dependent upon individual pieces of legislation, which means that such progress is dependent on the Congress. And we are all aware that gains granted through legislation can be taken away in the same manner. The absolute guarantee of equal treatment under the law that women deserve and seek can only be granted through a constitutional amendment.

Senator KENNEDY and I have been joined by 49 of our colleagues in the Senate who understand the importance of the equal rights amendment to ensuring equal treatment of women under the law. I hope that this year, as we celebrate 200 years of the Constitution's guarantee of freedom and equal opportunity, we will also be able to celebrate the inclusion of over half of our population in the protections provided by that historic document.

Let us make the equal rights amendment a priority for the 101st Congress. The time for writing the Nation's women into the Constitution is now.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, over 65 years ago, in 1923, the first equal rights amendment was introduced in the Congress. The amendment stipulated that "Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and every place subject to its jurisdiction."

Today, history will record another introduction of the same idea, that "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." Once again, we will repeat the words of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony, that "Men, their rights and nothing more; women, their rights and nothing less."

Lord Macauley once described our Constitution as "all sail and no anchor." I disagree with him, but I fear that we may find his description applicable to the fight for equal opportunities and equal rights for women. I believe that the Constitution is the anchor to the laws of the land. Perhaps more than that, it is the Constitution that charts where our laws should point. Without the ERA, whatever laws are passed to further the equality of women will be all sail and no anchor.

Since 1972, when Congress first approved the ERA, there have been many changes in the laws of the land, passed by Congress and State legislatures, or mandated by the courts. Yet, there is nothing in the Constitution to secure these laws. A persistent argument against the ERA has been that the amendment is unnecessary, that the rights which it would grant have been or are being granted by judicial decision or statute. Others have argued that expanded interpretations of the 14th amendment would guarantee the rights of women which the ERA would guarantee.

Perhaps the perception of legal necessity for ratification of the ERA has diminished since 1972. Yet what if we discover that the changes made over the last 15 years are like Lord Macauley's sails? Where will they take us when the tack changes? We must remember that despite changes in the law, what we seek through ratification of the ERA is the guarantee of fundamental rights, and the anchor for those laws.

This year marks the continuing commemoration of the Bicentennial of the Constitution. In May 1787, the delegates to the Constitutional Convention assembled in Philadelphia and began drafting the Constitution. In one of Abigail Adams' letters to her husband John, she encouraged him to modify the British laws and customs that dictated the near total subordination of a woman's status and identity to that of the man. She asked him to "remember the ladies."

Something happened on the way to the Convention. Neither Adams nor Jefferson nor Madison nor Hamilton seemed to remember the ladies; they were not included in the Constitution, and since then, for the past 200 years, American women have been struggling to secure the basic constitutional rights that are guaranteed to men, ones that we accept as self-evident.

It is written in the Declaration of Independence that "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal." Regrettably, we have learned through the painful experiences of history, including a bloody Civil War, that not all men were created equal in the eyes of the law and it took the 13th and 14th amendments to declare that the color of one's skin was not a rational or fair determination of one's rights.

I submit that the equal rights amendment will be no more redundant for women than the 13th and 14th amendments were for ethnic or racial minorities. The ERA is much more than a symbolic gesture, but if it were only symbolic it would be no less important. Our lives, our values, our social conscience are strongly influenced by symbols.

The heart of the matter is that not just for years, not just for generations, but for centuries, women have been regarded as being less deserving of full and equal rights and responsibilities. Because of their sex, a majority of the citizens in our society, regardless of their physical or intellectual ability, regardless of their potential for social contributions, are granted different rights, are stereotyped and suffer greater prejudices.

Centuries of discriminatory policies have denied women the right to equal participation and responsibility in our society. Without passage of a constitutional amendment, these inequalities will continue. Women will not achieve equality under the law.

The need for the ERA is no less urgent today than it was over 65 years ago when the first equal rights amendment was introduced in Congress. Women are entitled to nothing less than full equality of rights in the Constitution. It is my fervent hope that we will see the equal rights amendment in place as the 27th amendment to the Constitution in the very near future.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, on this first day of this 101st Congress, I am proud to join the senior Senator from Massachusetts in introducing this joint resolution to amend the Constitution to ensure for the women of this Nation equality under the law. The words of the equal rights amendment could not be more simple, and the message could not be more clear: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex."

Some will argue that statutes passed by the Congress, or laws passed by the various States, accomplish the objectives we seek here. While statutes do exist to protect women from discrimination in employment and education, they do not go far enough. These statutes contain exemptions and have been interpreted narrowly by some courts. Moreover, even the best intended and most effective statute cannot substitute for the basic, fundamental, and explicit inclusion of language in our Constitution ensuring the equality of women.

Mr. President, while women compose 45 percent of the work force today, economic equality and equal employment opportunity for women still have not been achieved. According to 1987 U.S. Census Bureau statistics, women who were employed full time earned less than 70 percent of the wages made by men. In addition, recent statistics collected by the National Commission on Working Women of Wider Opportunities for Women show that approximately 77 percent of all women were employed in so-called traditionally female jobs.

Something must be done to change this situation, and to better the economic and employment condition of women. Whether working outside the home or as homemakers, women need economic fairness in Social Security, credit, and retirement and pension plans.

For the last 33 Congresses, Mr. President, since 1923, a joint resolution to ensure equal rights for women has been introduced into the Congress, and brought before the Nation. We can no longer tell our wives, daughters, granddaughters, and friends that the Constitution has no room for them. We can no longer raise our sons or grandsons to tolerate anything less than the total equality of men and women under the law.

Mr. President, while the ERA will not affect the delightful differences between men and women, it will enable women to participate fully in all walks of life, and will teach any among us who doubt their abilities to doubt no more. We have waited too long, and on this day renew our commitment to the women of our Nation that we shall not abandon our goal.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today to join as a cosponsor of the equal rights amendment. The reintroduction of the ERA in the 101st Congress marks the beginning of a new campaign to secure the basic rights for all citizens of our Nation—a new campaign to pass and to ratify this imperative amendment to our Constitution.

Though ratification by the requisite 38 States fell just 3 States short in 1982, we are proud of our commitment and of our efforts in obtaining for women what is necessary and just. We must remind ourselves, however, of the difficulty the women of this Nation had in obtaining the right to vote and we must not give up the fight. When the 15th amendment was ratified and the institution of slavery was abolished, women, who were some of the most vigorous supporters of abolition, were left behind. They had to carry the fight for another 50 years before they, too, gained the right to vote. Women at that time and now do not seek special treatment; they seek basic justice and freedom. They seek equal rights as individuals and citizens under the law of our land.

As a father I have watched with great pleasure as my children, sons and daughters, have grown to their majority. As any parent in this body, I have taken great pride in them and have done my best to love, nurture, educate, and in general prepare them for what the future holds. But, I did not raise my daughters to accept the mantle of limited citizenship. I want for my daughters the same as I want for my sons—the opportunity to rise to the highest level that their ability will take them.

Unfortunately, this opportunity does not now exist. Women in this country suffer inequality in economic opportunities. Today, nearly 60 percent of America's women work outside the home. Yet, it is a fact that women are paid less and promoted less. In my State alone, women are paid about ⅝ to ⅔ what men make. And, we must recognize that the families of these working women also suffer when the mother receives unfair pay. Forty percent of working women have children under age 18, and the number of single-parent working women is steadily on the rise. With more and more women working outside the home, startling and blatant discrimination will only become worse unless we do something to bring about change.

The vehicle for change is the equal rights amendment. It is the most powerful tool to obtain equal pay and equal opportunity for the women of this Nation. Admittedly, much progress has been made since the equal rights amendment passed Congress in 1972 and was sent to the States for ratification. Much of this significant progress came in anticipation of the passage of the amendment. And, these are accomplishments in which the whole Nation should be proud. But the truth remains that there is much to be accomplished.

As we embark on a new session of Congress, we should reflect on the freedom that makes us a strong, productive country. We need the equal rights amendment to make the word freedom whole and meaningful for every citizen. It is time to make the equal rights amendment a part of the U.S. Constitution, and I pledge my continuing support in gaining its passage and ratification.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, once again I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of the equal rights amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

There is no question that an era ought to be a part of the Constitution already. Over 50 percent of our population is female. Surely, as a nation committed to equal justice under law, we should include in our Constitution a guarantee against sex discrimination.

The era I am cosponsoring is a simple, straightforward assertion of basic human rights. It states:

> Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

We cannot, with a clear conscience, continue to deny to over half our citizens this basic legal protection. This time we must be sure that the era is not only approved by the 100th Congress, but also ratified by the State legislatures.

We need an era. Those who say we don't haven't looked at the evidence.

There are still State and Federal laws which contain gender-based distinctions. Some of these laws have been held constitutional, and others remain on in our laws books. An era is necessary to completely eliminate the effect of these laws. An era would also require—and encourage legislative reform.

An era would give women clear—and permanent protection against discrimination in public employment. Historically, both Federal and State governments maintained explicit, gender-based discrimination in public employment. Though most explicit barriers have been stricken, these historical distinctions are perpetuated in informal and subtle ways. Patterns and practices of gender discrimination continue, reinforced and legitimized by past traditions and the stereotyping which has resulted from these traditions. In addition, most State and Federal employment discrimination laws do permit gender distinctions.

The result is that women are not only excluded from certain occupations but their income is diminished as well. Women have achieved some protection against employment discrimination through Federal and State laws, but some gender-based distinctions are permitted by employment discrimination laws. An era would outlaw all discrimination in public employment. Women would enjoy more employment opportunities and State and Federal governments would more fully receive the benefit of their services and talents.

An era would also outlaw gender-based discrimination in public education. Historically, Federal, State, and local government required and/or approved explicit, gender-based distinctions in public education. Though few explicit barriers remain, patterns and practices of gender discrimination continue to exist.

Discrimination in education has adversely affected women. It has limited, and continues to limit, the intellectual and developmental possibilities of women. Discrimination in education has limited, and continues to limit, the employment and income opportunities of women and their families. The effects of past and present discrimination in education are manifested in the dramatic sex segregation of many occupations [1] and the substantially lower wages women receive.[2]

An era would make gender-based discrimination in education unlawful. An era would also empower Congress to eliminate the present and past effects of discrimination in education.

State laws have also restricted the economic and social opportunities of women through the maintenance of gender-based, stereotypical distinctions which have been traditionally embodied in family and martial law. An era would outlaw these distinctions as well.

A recent Carnegie Foundation report rejects the view that occupational segregation and income disparities have resulted solely from the free choices women make in an open market. On the contrary, says the report, the evidence "suggests * * * that women face discrimination and institutional barriers in their education, training, and employment. Often the opportunities some encounter * * * constrain their choices to a narrow set of alternatives." [3]

The status of women in our society is due in part to the historical inequality which governments have sponsored and condoned for many years.

An ERA would add to the Constitution a mandate to end sex discrimination, the roots of which reach deeply into every part of our society. A constitutional amendment will provide additional and needed power to eliminate root and branch, past and present sex discrimination from our society.

Some say that we can leave this business of sex equality to the courts. This we cannot do. I would be the first to say that the courts, especially the Supreme Court, have done a great deal to guarantee sex equality under our Constitution. But when I look closely at these decisions I see a great deal of division over the role of the Judiciary in guaranteeing sex equality. The judges are divided over the amount of scrutiny they ought to give gender classifications. As a result, the scope of constitutional protection against sex inequality seems to vary with the circumstances and with the composition of our courts. The passage of an ERA is necessary to clarify our Constitution and to give guidance to the judges. The passage of an ERA is necessary to make it clear that sex inequality is unconstitutional inequality.

The passage of the ERA would not eliminate the role of the courts in guaranteeing sex equality. The courts would be called upon to interpret the ERA, and to decide upon the constitutionality of statutes passed pursuant to the ERA. The courts would be an important partner in the flight to guarantee sex equality. But Congress and the American people must take the lead and enact a clear constitutionally required standard of sex equality.

Others say we ought to let Congress and the States guarantee sex equality by statute. But a statutory approach is simply not adequate.

For a variety of reasons, statutes which include gender-based distinctions remain on the books. And States do continue to pass laws which permit gender-based distinctions. Perhaps these phenomena occur because women are not well represented in this legislature. In 1971, women were 2.8 percent of the Members of Congress; in 1986 they are still less than 5 percent. In 1971, women made up only 4.7 percent of the State legislatures, in 1985 they were merely 14.8 percent. But whatever the reason for the persistence of these statutes, an ERA would have a nullifying effect.

We cannot wait for legislatures to eliminate discriminatory statutes or to outlaw discriminatory State policies. Statutes alone are inadequate because the legislative process is affected by the perception that some gender-based distinctions are acceptable under the 14th amendment. As a result, legislators who support gender distinctions as a matter of policy draw comfort and solace from the state of constitutional uncertainty. An ERA would eliminate the perception that sex inequality is constitutionally acceptable. An ERA would require that legislatures set aside their personal feelings and enforce a clear constitutional mandate.

An ERA is also necessary because statutory guarantees currently in effect may be repealed by Congress and State legislatures. The viability of this legislation depends upon shifting legislative majorities while an ERA would embody in our Constitution a permanent guarantee of sex equality.

Surely we all agree that women deserve to be equal partners in this constitutional enterprise. We have waited too long to take this giant step toward meaningful equal justice under law. Only a constitutional amendment will suffice.

The bicentennial year of our Constitution has come and gone, and we have celebrated our enduring Constitution. We heard many speeches about the giant strides we have made in constitutional governance and the progress we have made toward equal justice under the law. But the women of this country celebrated a half century of uncertain constitutional status.

We have waited long enough. It is time that we included women as equal partners in this constitutional enterprise.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Women are still 98.8 percent of the secretaries, 75.4 percent of the elementary school teachers, 89.7 percent of the bookkeepers, 83.5 percent of the cashiers, 88 percent of the waiters, 72.7 percent of the sales workers, 95.9 percent of the registered nurses, and 87.8 percent of the nursing aides. Overall, among the 503 occupations listed in the 1980 census, 275 were greater than 80 percent male or female. N.Y. Times, Dec. 12, 1985, at A20, COL. 1.

The 1986 Carnegie report also states that women still earn about 60 cents to every dollar earned by men. The report noted that in 1981, the median salary for women who worked fulltime throughout the year was $12,001, compared to a median male salary of $20,260. White women over 18 earned about 60 percent of the salary of white men, while black women earned about 54 percent of the salary of white men. The report states that sex segregation in occupations accounts for much of this disparity.

Washington Post, April 18, 1986, at C11, COL. 1. This Stanford University researcher concluded that women's gains have been offset by other factors which contribute to economic well-being. Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Connecticut State Senate, I was fond to support passage of the equal rights amendment to our State constitution in 1974.

Fifteen years later, the U.S. Constitution still has no such amendment of its own. And so, I am pleased to join with Senator EDWARD M. KENNEDY as a cosponsor of his reintroduction of the equal rights amendment.

The equal rights amendment is an important affirmation of the right of women to be treated equally under the U.S. Constitution. It is a simple proposition with which few should disagree. Yet passage of the ERA has proven elusive. Similarly, the realization of truly equal rights in this country has not been achieved.

Our laws, expressed in their highest form in our Constitution, encode our sense of values. We value equal rights for women, so let us include the equal rights amendment in our Constitution. Its presence in that document would go a long way toward eradicating the discriminating practices that still keep women from enjoying the full fruits of our freedom as Americans.

S.J. Res. 2. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget and tax limitation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON A BALANCED BUDGET AND TAX LIMITATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, at the beginning of a new administration, it is important to focus on issues that really matter. That's why for this Senator, it is extremely gratifying to have the opportunity to state the case for a balanced budget amendment. I know my colleagues are aware of my conviction that this constitutional change is essential to the long-term fiscal health of this Nation. I hope at least two-thirds of them will share my conviction.

Mr. President, as I have in previous Congresses, I am today introducing the balanced budget amendment in the form I prefer: Putting limits on both deficit spending and the tax burden. Nevertheless, I am open to other formulations, and this language certainly is not written in stone. What is important here is the principle.

At the outset, let me acknowledge the extraordinary efforts of those who have kept this issue on the front burner over the years. The list is led by my good friend STROM THURMOND, who has worked tirelessly for this kind of fundamental fiscal reform for decades. He led the good fight for this amendment in the last Congress, as a true believer on this issue.

The leadership of the distinguished ranking member of the Constitution Subcommittee, ORRIN HATCH, has also been critical to this struggle. Senator HATCH has been in the trenches constantly on behalf of the balanced budget amendment and has not wavered for one moment from his devotion to this cause.

A SIMPLE PRINCIPLE

Mr. President, the amendment I am introducing embodies a simple principle: That except under extraordinary situations, outlays of the Federal Government should not exceed receipts. For a deficit to occur, this amendment requires that Congress must specifically authorize an excess of outlays over receipts by a three-fifths vote. And to preserve a bias in favor of controlling spending, we have included a requirement that increases in the level of taxation cannot be passed except by a majority of all Members of the House and Senate, not just those present and voting.

This amendment presents the Congress with an historic opportunity to restore a proper balance to the way we conduct the fiscal affairs of the Government. It is not a quick fix, a response to a sudden shift in public opinion, or an attempt to evade our assigned duties under the Constitution to make spending and taxing decisions. This idea has been around for some time, but in recent years it has gained momentum because of the growing realization that there is something fundamentally wrong with the way we conduct fiscal policy.

Fundamental problems demand fundamental solutions. Those of us who have worked to develop a responsible constitutional amendment over the years have not taken lightly our duty to respect the form and the spirit of the basic law of the land. The language of this amendment is appropriate to the Constitution. It is not premised on any particular economic philosophy, but rather on the belief that Congress ought to make specific decisions on fiscal policy and be held accountable for those decisions. The amendment requires that we follow consistent procedures in setting fiscal policy, and establishes firm parameters to govern those procedures. Although these constraints are quite simple, they are something, which based on recent experience, Congress obviously need.

A POPULAR MANDATE

The American people clearly are convinced that our fiscal house is not in order. Popular concern over runaway budgets is the reason why the drive for a Constitutional Convention to draft a fiscal restraint amendment is only a few States short of its goal. Polls consistently show that 70 to 80 percent of the American people support a balanced budget amendment. Although no one should maintain that we ought to take certain steps just because they are popular, in this case it seems that people are ahead of the politicians. Americans understand that Congressional spending habits have to be put under a firm limitation, and that only new procedures, externally imposed, can do the job. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to listen to the voters and support this amendment.

I would also suggest that this amendment, if approved by Congress, is not the end of the story. It is the beginning. Legislative implementation and compliance will be a complex and difficult matter—we should not deceive ourselves on that point. We have learned from the experience of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, law that enforcement is not a simple matter, but enforcement can and will be achieved once we have a clear constitutional obligation to fulfill.

CONCLUSION

We can demonstrate our willingness and ability to balance the Federal budget by moving swiftly to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets for fiscal year 1990. Serious action on the deficit will convince the American people that we are serious about the budget problem and that this Constitutional amendment will be given full force and effect. Our actions on each of these matters will have a major impact now and for years to come. Let us be sure that we make the right choices in the 101st Congress. Let us be sure that we make the right choices in the 101st Congress.

I ask for unanimous consent that the entire joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

S.J. Res. 3. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for protection of unborn children and other persons; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON THE RIGHTS OF UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, this past Sunday, January 22, marked the 16th anniversary of the Supreme Court's decision legalizing abortion. Since 1973 many of my colleagues have sponsored legislation which would amend the Constitution to protect the right to live of the most helpless in our society, the unborn child. I have sponsored this legislation in the previous six Congresses and am pleased to have Senator MCCLURE join me as an original cosponsor to this amendment, known as the human life amendment, in the 101st Congress.

The amendment states that:

With respect to the right to life, the word 'person' as used * * * in the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments to the Constitution * * * applies to all human beings, irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every state of their biological development.

It goes on to specify that measures necessary to prevent the death of the mother should not be prohibited.

This amendment would overturn the infamous Roe versus Wade decision. We believe that the Court's decision is fundamentally in conflict with the basic values and beliefs that bind our very nation together; that the Court is unjustly mandating a wholesale violation of human rights in the abortion of millions of unborn children; that it stepped beyond the expressed intent and spirit of our Constitution.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time that Court has made an error on the matter of human rights. Sadly, our Nation's history is filled with examples where human rights have been denied to a large segment of our society. The most obvious example of such a court error can be seen in the case of Dred Scott. The Court ruled that Dred Scott did not have any human rights because his life was not considered to be of value in and of itself in the eyes of the law. He was considered to be merely the property of his owner. The Supreme Court was wrong in the Dred Scott case, The Supreme Court is wrong in Roe versus Wade for the same fundamental reason. It dictates who is human, and thus protected by the law, and who is not human, and thus has no protection.

Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Specific attention must be paid to the phrase "all men are created equal." Obviously, human life begins from the very moment of creation—at conception—as evidenced by the teachings of medical and scientific research, not at birth. At this creation these rights are self-evidently equal, and should be treated as such. Any other line is merely arbitrary.

Advocates of abortion often speak as though they have some kind of corner on rights, justice, equality, and humanitarianism. They are free to believe that, if they wish, but I don't think there can be much justice or humaneness in a philosophy which espouses abortion on demand.

In the Sunday, January 22, issue of the Washington Post, an article entitled "The Abortion Papers" focused on the arbitrary line drawn by the Court in Roe versus Wade. I quote from the Post:

The opinion's author [for Roe v. Wade] Justice Harry A. Blackmun, said in one internal memo that he was drawing 'arbitrary' lines about the time during a pregnancy when a women could legally receive an abortion.

The article goes on to state that the internal memos of Justice William O. Douglas indicate that the Justices knew they were acting in a legislative capacity, which we know is not the proper role for the Court.

Aside from the fact that the court has overstepped its bounds, the real core of this issue—as it was in the Dred Scott case—is the moral value we place on human life. Is there really any difference in the essential reasoning behind advocates of slavery and advocates of abortion? I know this is a harsh statement—some would say an unfair analogy. At the same time, I do not want to minimize the size, the cost and personal impact of problems resulting from unwanted pregnancies or potential birth defects. I think President Bush eloquently and accurately portrayed the role that must be played when he stated, in his inaugural address, that there are young women throughout this Nation who are about to become mothers of children they cannot care for and perhaps will not love. They need our care, our guidance, and education; though we bless them for choosing life. But most important, we must protect the inalienable right to life and liberty. Rights which are being prohibited to millions of innocent lives each year.

In the same spirit which the 14th amendment was offered to this Congress, we now bring before you this amendment. We will not simply go away. This issue will not disappear until the Constitution is returned to a document which protects the rights of all human life.

I thank Senator MCCLURE for joining me in cosponsoring this effort and also those in this body who may now wish to support my efforts by cosponsoring this amendment. I commend, as well, the individual efforts of several of my colleagues in their fight to protect the unborn. I also thank the thousands who came to this city and those throughout the country who on Monday gathered to peacefully protest the Supreme Court's decisions, as well as mourn the violent deaths of the unborn that continue to take place even now. I lend my voice to the protest and call upon you in this Congress to join with me.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of my amendment immediately follow this statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S.J. Res. 5. Joint resolution to establish a national policy for the taking of predatory or scavenging mammals and birds on public lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

NATIONAL POLICY ON PREDATORS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a national policy for the taking of scavenging mammals and birds on public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, as we end the decade of the eighties, there is some cause for optimism in the course of human affairs, from a relaxation of the cold war to subtle advances in our search for an answer to AIDS. In the environment, there are fewer positive portents. For we are trailed by the shadow, ever larger with time, of a planet fighting back—fighting our plunder, our colossal waste, our mindless exploitation of the Earth's resources.

The harbingers of this conflict between the Earth and mankind's use of the Earth are increasingly obvious, from global warming to polluted beaches. And while the historical process that brought us to this point is complex, the origins of the conflict are fairly simple: We have seriously misread our relationship with the Earth and with the Earth's other species. It is a misreading that is proving costly to life itself.

Among the many areas where our desires for dominion have exceeded nature's bounds is in wildlife management. When I first introduced a bill to require Federal policy to take seriously the relationship between predator and prey species, the issue seemed arcane to many. But I believe this bill will be taken more seriously now. For we are discovering, however painfully, that this is more than a mechanistic world that we can shape to our own ends. We are learning that costs are paid when human hands tip the scales of ecological balance.

The bill I introduce today—as in previous Congresses—addresses three critical issues in national wildlife management, especially management policies as they relate to predators and prey. One is the need to establish, within the broad parameters of wildlife management policies, a clear understanding and recognition of the interdependency of predator and prey; a second is the need to establish a national policy for the taking of predators or scavengers—mammals or birds—on public lands, a policy that reflects a through understanding of these interdependent relationships; and a third is the need to set forth a series of clear, statutory procedures for the taking of predators on public lands. These procedures must be responsive to the right of all Americans to know how wildlife management policies relevant to predators are being carried out on lands that are owned by the public and managed in the national interest.

Predators and scavengers in the environment are indispensable. Every ecosystem has predatory forms of life. Few animal species, except larger predators themselves, are completely free from predation.

We are beginning, through studies in ecology and evolutionary biology, to understand just how important predators are in the ecosystem. We are learning to see predators not just as obstacles to the flourishing of life, but as vital components in the chain of life that includes man. In fact, in this chain, predators have a niche every bit as important to the survival of the Earth's species as any other part of that chain.

Just as the introduction of exotic species can adversely affect the balance of an ecosystem, so can the removal of predators. Predators are known to be vital to keeping plant-eating animal populations from overgrazing and consequently disrupting the food chain within an ecosystem. Without predators, prey populations tend to expand beyond the ability of an ecosystem to sustain that population. Predator populations themselves are kept in check by a system of natural controls, including the size of the prey population.

Predators, too, are powerful evolutionary forces on their prey. In fact, as naturalist Stephen Jay Gould points out, natural history to a large extent is a tale of different adaptations to avoid predation.

It's not unusual, for example, to see a squirrel dart almost purposefully in front of a car, often with fatal results for the animal. In its moment of panic, the squirrel holds its bushy tail over its back and zigzags wildly on the road. Actually, the animal is responding the same way it does when fleeing a predator, and while the technique is faulty for escaping cars, a pursuing hawk is likely to either miss the squirrel entirely or grasp only the tail instead of the animal.

The morning dove is one of the commonest bird species in North America. The dove also knows the value of dodging when attempting an escape, and doves play tricks with their tails, too. The morning dove is quite drab in coloration, except that each tail feather is tipped in white. As the bird flees, its outspread tail presents a vibrant semicircle of white spots—a target, in effect, to catch a predator's eye. But to grasp a dove's tail is to receive a loose bunch of feathers instead of a struggling dove.

But escape is not the only way species deal with predation. Another ploy is the phenomenon of predator satiation, where a species will flourish with such speed and in such numbers that the predators' ability to deplete an entire species is simply overwhelmed. Such species expansions occur in relatively short bursts, and then subside, and the theme of nature—balance—reigns once more.

The point is, if predators were suddenly taken from the environment, one very powerful factor would be removed from the ecological balance which nurtures animal and plant life on Earth. Animal species became adapted to survival through all kinds of environmental factors, including natural populations of predators which themselves are continually refining their own adaptations through this same process of evolution. This system accounts for what we see and revere as life on Earth. It is a system that is remarkably effective, and with which we tamper at our peril.

This is not to say that individual predators cannot be removed from the environment. They can be, and sometimes they must be. But the wholesale slaughter of predator species carries with it the long-range threat of impeding the survival-by-adaptation of significant animal species. By implication, we impede human progress. Animal species, of which man is one, are interdependent.

Wildlife managers often attempt to duplicate the quantitative impact of predation through establishing hunting seasons geared to remove the "harvestable surplus" of an animal population. However, wildlife managers cannot duplicate the qualitative impact of predation in any practical sense. For example, a tiger may attempt 30 kills before finally succeeding. Likewise, a falcon may pursue two dozen quarry before making a kill. Each unsuccessful attempt means the adaptations of the prey were sufficient to keep it alive. Each successful kill represents a prey individual that was carrying some fatal disadvantage—physical incapability, age, injury, disease, or some unknown quality which might be generalized as "bad luck." Thus, predators exert consistent pressures on the prey that are beneficial to the health of the prey population. Wildlife professionals are increasingly sensitive to the indispensable presence of natural predator populations.

Mythology about predators still persist. Some people still swear that wolves, cougars, or other predators are capable of obliterating, for example, the deer population in a given region or State. Such assertions are simply not supported by the facts. Predator-prey systems have persisted throughout the millenia, and both predators and prey species have evolved mechanisms which tend to keep the whole system operating as long as favorable environmental conditions persists.

Fluctuations in prey populations can actually be reduced by the presence of predators. As a case in point, the moose population on Isle Royale National Park, an island ecosystem in Lake Superior, persisted, unevenly, for many years in the absence of wolves. The population was observed to rise steeply for a time and then crash abruptly when available browse was exhausted. This cycle was observed at least twice in the early 20th century. Wolves eventually colonized the island by crossing the winter ice. What researchers later observed was that both predator and prey populations steadied themselves through their interactions: The Moose population neither rose as high nor fell as low in the presence of the wolves, and the wolf population itself held relatively steady year after year.

For the wolf, pack structure is the key to balance between predator and environment. If prey species decline, the wolf pack feels the stress of limited food supplies. Stress is reflected in increased friction between pack members. Eventually, some pack members may be ejected from the pact to face uncertain survival odds on their own. Even in the best of conditions, the social order of the pact permits only the dominant male and dominant female to mate; each pack produces only one litter of pups in a season. In times of stress, however, the pups are the first to die, thus maximizing the chances for survival of the adult pack unit upon which the wolves depend so heavily. The pack structure is best interpreted as an adaptation which enables the wolf to take prey larger and stronger than a single wolf, which maximizes the survivability of each pack member, and which keeps the wolf from out-eating the available prey.

Many other predators and scavengers show adaptations as sophisticated as those of the wolf. There are predators capable of exploiting almost every form of life. Ospreys dive after fish; black-footed ferrets—now critically endangered—prey on burrowing prairie dogs beneath the earth; the pine martin races after squirrels in the trees. In every case, the predator is an important component of the ecosystem, and every effort should be made to understand and protect this natural order.

The policies of the Federal Governemnt regarding predators must be viewed in this context.

The Federal Government is charged with stewardship over our 450 million acre public domain heritage. The land is held in trust for all Americans, and is properly administered under multiple-use guidelines.

The traditional framework for wildlife management involving "resident" species, or most wildlife other than migratory birds, involves State fish and wildlife agencies operating under cooperative agreements with the Bureau of Land Management. Eagles and other raptors, wild horses and burros, and marine mammals are administered under Federal law on both State and Federal land.

The State-Federal cooperative agreements have created an acceptable and proper basis for wildlife management activities. The States have done a good job of organizing their wildlife departments and administering wildlife restoration projects, hunting seasons, and research programs.

Where public lands are involved, the Federal Government has the responsibility to respect and uphold the public interest. Public land managers and wildlife managers operating on public land must not lose sight of this fundamental tenet. Further, decisions involving major public land programs must be evaluated in light of the impact on public values. Such an evaluation must involve both the Federal Government and the public.

The bill I introduce today provides an adequate system for review and decision on national predator policies and action. I believe it will provide a comprehensive examination of Federal policy with regard to predators, and that such an examination will help us avoid costly, nonproductive management mistakes—mistakes that derive substantially from a continuing failure to comprehend the essential relationship between predator and prey.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution and a section-by-section analysis be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the materiel was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 5

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution vests authority in the Federal Government to "make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States," and

Whereas predators and scavengers are indispensable to the health and stability of natural ecosystems and to prey species in particular, and

Whereas the extermination of predators has resulted in dramatic instability of prey populations and attendant habitat deterioration, and

Whereas there is no evidence that nonhuman predation alone is a cause of extinction of prey; and

Whereas organisms tend to be closely adapted to their environment by evolution, whereby their survival ability is greatest, and

Whereas evolution occurs in response to changing environmental parameters, including the living and nonliving components of the ecosystem, and

Whereas a thorough understanding of the interdependent relationship between predator and prey is essential to sound wildlife and land use planning at all levels of government, and furthermore,

Whereas the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora, as ratified by the United States Senate, stipulates that native species of wildlife should be maintained throughout their range at a level consistent with their role in the ecosystems in which they occur: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all taking of predators or scavengers naturally occurring on public lands for all or part of their life cycles is hereby prohibited unless such taking is approved according to the requirements of sections 3 or 4 of this joint resolution.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this Act, the following definitions apply:

"Predators" include individuals of any species of bird or mammal that regularly capture or consume other vertebrate species.

"Wildlife" includes all species of the animal kingdom (persisting for all or part of their life cycles on ecosystems of the United States, its coastal waters, or adjacent islands) which are covered by the provisions of this Act.

"Public lands" means any lands belonging to the United States of America on which regulations regarding taking of wildlife covered by this Act are or may become less restrictive than those herein provided.

"Species" includes any subspecies of wildlife covered by this Act and any other group of wildlife covered by this Act of the same species or smaller taxa in common special arrangement that interbreed when mature.

"Person" means an individual, corporation, partnership, trust, association, or any other private entity, or any officer, employee, agent, department or instrumentality of the Federal Government, of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government.

"Take" means to harass, harm, pursue, hunt, shoot, wound, kill, trap, capture, or collect, or attempt to engage in any such conduct, for any purpose, any wolf, predator, or other form of wildlife covered by this Act, excluding taking for subsistence purposes.

"Scavengers" include individuals of any species of bird or mammal that naturally feed upon the remains of dead vertebrate species.

An "ecosystem" is the basic ecological unit including the living organisms, the nonliving environment, and the interactions between individual organisms, between species, and between organisms and the environment.

A "secretary" is the head of a Federal agency having land management responsibilities, including the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Defense, the head of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and others.

SEC. 3. Proposed actions by any person involving the taking of predators or scavengers naturally occurring on public lands of the United States may be carried out (unless prohibited by other statute or regulation) even though the taking can be reasonably expected to have significant impacts on the specific wildlife covered by this Act, other species of wildlife covered by this Act, or the ecosystems of which the wildlife is a part, if proposals for such actions—

(a) are submitted to the Secretary having primary jurisdiction over the public land on which the taking will occur at least one hundred and twenty days prior to the date such taking is to commence; and

(b) are described by notice in the Federal Register, allowing as least sixty days for public comment; and

(c) will, if carried out, maintain that species at a level consistent with its role in the ecosystem in which taking is to occur, protecting and maintaining the indispensable relationship between predator and prey species and the ecosystem, and be in overall public interest; and

(d) are approved in writing by the Secretary after consideration of public comment and consultation with the President's Council on Environmental Quality and with the Director of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service before any taking is carried out.

SEC. 4. The Secretary shall enforce the provisions of this Act and shall, in consultation with the President's Council on Environmental Quality, promulgate such regulations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions, including enforcement, of this Act: Provided, That all mammals or birds shot or captured contrary to the provisions of this section, or of any regulation issued hereunder, and all guns, aircraft, and other equipment used to aid in the shooting, attempting to shoot, capturing, or harassing of any mammal or bird in violation of this section or of any regulation issued hereunder shall be subject to forfeiture to the United States: And provided further, That the Secretary or head of any Federal agency who has issued a lease, license, permit, or other agreement to any person who is convicted of a violation of this Act or of any regulation issued hereunder may immediately cancel each such lease, license, permit, or other agreement. The United States shall not be liable for the payment of any compensation, reimbursement, or damages in connection with the cancellation of any lease, license, permit, or other agreement pursuant to this section.

SEC. 5. Nothing herein shall be construed in any way to amend or otherwise alter the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, or the Endangered Species Act of 1973, as amended.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

By Mr. DeCONCINI (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. SIMON, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. DANFORTH):

S.J. Res. 9. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO BALANCED BUDGET

● Mr. DeCONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget. This amendment is identical to the compromise balanced budget amendment reported by the Constitution Subcommittee last Congress.

For a dozen years now, I have made this annual pilgrimage to the Senate floor. Twelve times I have asked for the support of my colleagues in producing a balanced budget amendment which would garner the votes necessary for enactment into law. For over a decade, I have attended hearing after hearing to be told repeatedly by expert witnesses that unless something is done, and done soon, our generation will be responsible for lowering the quality of life for future generations. Year after year, I have met with and worked with groups such as the National Taxpayers Union in an effort to develop legislation acceptable to those doubting the need for a balanced budget. The road has been very long and filled with many obstacles.

Just last Congress, the Constitution Subcommittee reached a bipartisan compromise on what many considered to be a workable piece of legislation calling for a balanced budget. Nevertheless, the compromise legislation never received consideration by the full committee. I understand the need for control over the agenda of a committee. On more than one occasion I have relied on the rules of the Senate, committees, and subcommittees. Yet, I am of the mind that for certain issues of great importance to the country, such as balancing the budget, steps must be taken to insure full debate and consideration by the Senate. The stakes are too high to put aside the matter for another day.

The deficit resulting from the continued failure to balance the Federal budget is one of the most, if not the most, pressing problems the new administration faces as we begin the 101st Congress. A recently published GAO report on the budget deficit states that "[a]mong the most urgent issues facing [the] new administration and the new Congress is the budget deficit. Unless this problem is solved * * * it will make it very difficult to begin addressing the Nation's unmet needs, and it could sap our long-run economic vitality."

Under the resolution I introduce today, total outlays of the United States for a given fiscal year cannot exceed total receipts unless three-fifths of the Members of both Houses of Congress provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts. In this way Members of Congress will be held accountable for voting to increase the deficit.

In addition to being held accountable for increasing the deficit, accountability will result by requiring a roll-call vote of both Houses of Congress on any bill for raising taxes. Furthermore, such a bill shall become law only if approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses. At some point we here in Congress must be willing to stand up and be counted. We must be responsible for our action to our constituents back home. If tax legislation is required to tackle the deficit problem, we should answer to those who have elected us to office. This provision, along with the previously mentioned section, provides that accountability.

Congress is not the only branch of Government which should be scrutinized. The executive branch and the President have a duty to the American people as well. Each year the President initiates the budget process by sending a budget request to Congress. Yet, for the last 8 years, President Reagan has failed to forward a balanced budget to Congress. Right from the start, Congress has been working with figures, which if, adopted would increase the deficit. And as we all know, that has too often been the outcome.

Section 3 of the resolution requires the President, prior to each fiscal year, to transmit to Congress a proposed Federal budget for that fiscal year in which total outlays do not exceed total receipts. To overcome the deficit hurdle created by many years of loose spending, all parties to the budget process must become active participants. A balanced budget proposal would assist Congress with producing a final balanced budget. Without cooperation from the President, the budget process will likely continue to be a long drawn-out battle resulting in excessive spending. Future generations can ill-afford this economic extravagance on our part.

The short-term socio-economic byproducts of budget deficit spending are easily seen. The already massive trade deficit grows larger each reporting period. Foreign investments crowd domestic investment markets. Manufacturing declines as our economy depends more and more on service-oriented businesses. But as we focus on the immediate effects of budget irresponsibility, the most disheartening and severe result of our frivolous expenditures is often overlooked. It is the future generations which will suffer great pains because of our shortsightedness.

Our children and generations which follow will be faced with addressing problems for which our generation has thus far neglected to take responsibility. A slow but definite erosion of economic power is currently taking place and it is those generations yet to come who will be burdened by present trends. "Downward mobility," once thought to be nothing more than doomsayer rhetoric, could become a reality for many. If for no other reason than for the dreams of tomorrows held by our youth, we must break from habit today.

I am heartened to hear the newly sworn President speak of a new commitment, a new dedication, a new "breeze blowing." President Bush has indicated his support for a balanced budget amendment on repeated occasions. Now that he has taken up the reins of the country, his leadership on this issue could indeed be helpful. The battle has been long fought and reinforcements will not be turned away.

This is no time for politics. The stakes are much too high for gamesmanship. We must face our responsibility and Act for the good of future generations. I urge my colleagues to join with me and lend their support to the effort to swiftly pass a balanced budget amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 9

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today I rise to address perhaps the most important issue facing our Nation—the national debt.

As Thomas Jefferson said:

The public debt is the greatest of dangers to be feared by a republican government.

Andrew Jackson remarked:

Once the budget is balanced and the debts paid off, our population will be relieved from a considerable portion of its present burdens and will find additional means for the display of individual enterprise.

The two quotes from early American Presidents illustrate an important truth: no concept is more a part of traditional American fiscal policy than that of the balanced budget. Throughout most of the Nation's history, the requirement of budget balancing under normal economic circumstances was considered to be a sound and fundamental policy.

Influenced by individuals such as Adam Smith, David Hume, and David Ricardo, the drafters of the Constitution and their immediate successors at the helm of the new government strongly feared the effects of public debt. Even Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson, who had widely diverse perspectives on the role of the Federal Government, were in agreement that, whatever debt happened to be accrued by a nation, it ought to be repaid within some prescribed period of time.

Early American Presidents were in virtually unanimous agreement on the dangers of excessive public debt. Consequently, for approximately 150 years of our history—from 1798 to 1932—balanced budgets or surplus budget were the norm. While budget procedures had little of their present organization, the concept of a balanced budget was accepted widely as the hallmark of fiscal responsibility. Those dificits that did occur—during wartime or during the most severe recessions—normally were compensated for by subsequent surpluses.

Between 1932 and 1960 the rigid rule of annual balanced budgets gave way to a fiscal policy in which balanced budgets remained an overall objective but in which deficit spending nevertheless was viewed as a tool occasionally useful to effect appropriate economic results. New economic theories had emerged that placed great weight upon the ability of the Federal Government to manage fiscal policy through deficits and surpluses.

However, a real turning point in the history of U.S. fiscal policies occurred during the 1960's. Even the Keynesian objective of balancing surplus years with deficit years succumbed to the idea of regular, annual uncompensated-for deficits.

During the past two decades, the Federal Government has run deficits in all but a single year. The deficits have come during good economic times, and they have come during bad economic times. They have come from Presidents who have pledged themselves to balanced budgets, and they have come from Presidents whose fiscal priorities were elsewhere. They have come from Presidents of both parties.

Even more alarming, the magnitude of these deficits has increased enormously. for the 7 fiscal years ending in 1967, the total deficit was approximately $91 billion. For the 7 fiscal years ending in 1981, the total deficit was approximately $450 billion. The total national debt stands just over $2.6 trillion, with nearly two-thirds of that total incurred during the past decade alone.

MAGNITUDE OF FEDERAL DEBT

The number $2.6 trillion is too clean and simple sounding to communicate the implications of our staggering debt. In 1975, before this recent borrowing spree, the Federal debt amounted to approximately $2,500 per person and the annual interest charges cost roughly $250 per taxpayer. Only 1 year ago, the Federal debt amounted to over $10,000 per person. By 1992, according to 1988 Congressional budget Office projections, the debt could reach $13,500 per person. Even if the Government adheres to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit ceilings, tens of billions of dollars will be added to the national debt. These last figures—which must be considered optimistic—would mean a fourfold increase in per-capita debt. This gives a better picture of the actual magnitude of the debt. It still does not describe, however, the human implications. The human implications are that our children are being shackled with an insurmountable burden as a result of our largess. Over time, the disproportionate burdens imposed on today's children and their children by a continuing pattern of deficits will include some combination of the following:

First, increased taxes; second, reduced public welfare benefits; third, reduced public pensions; fourth, reduced expenditures on infrastructure and other public investments; fifth, diminished capital formation, job creation, productivity enhancement, and real wage growth in the private economy; sixth, higher interest rates; seventh, higher inflation; eighth, increased indebtedness to and economic dependence on foreign creditors; and ninth, increased risk or default on the Federal debt.

Perhaps the most significant effect of today's unrestrained borrowing, however, will be a reduction in the political choices available to future governments of this Nation. From 1952 through 1975, the interest cost on the Federal debt consumed between 6.7 percent and 8.3 percent of annual revenues. Since then, that percentage has risen steadily. By 1988, interest costs consumed 16.7 percent of annual revenues.

In fiscal year 1988, 85.4 percent of Federal Government expenditures were financed by tax revenues, and the remaining 22 percent by borrowing. Of this situation, one could say that the American people were getting a dollar's worth of Government for every 78 cents' worth of taxes. But at what cost? Future taxpayers—including today's children—face the sad prospect of receiving 78 cents' worth of Government for every dollar's worth of taxes.

Efforts to secure a constitutional rule to require a balanced Federal budget and to limit the growth of Federal spending have intensified as the Federal Government's persistent failure to balance its budget has produced debt of over $2.6 trillion and as the Federal share of the economy has continued to increase.

In a large measure, the Nation's economic problems are attributable to these facts. Unacceptable levels of inflation and unemployment, as well as enormous foreign trade imbalances, can be traced directly or indirectly to the fiscal policies and practices of the National Government.

This balanced budget amendment will reestablish constitutional limitations upon Federal spending and deficit practices that existed in earlier years through an array of formal and informal principles and understandings and which have been eroded over the course of recent years. The abandonment of the fundamental policy requirement of balanced budgets, the passage of the 16th amendment, and the development of new judicial doctrines concerning the Federal spending authority are some of the features that have contributed to the present situation in which there is insufficient external constraint upon the ability of Congress to spend.

Specifically, the proposed amendment addresses a serious spending bias in the present fiscal process arising from the fact that Members of Congress do not have to cast votes in behalf of new taxes in order to accommodate new spending programs. Rather than having to cast such politically disadvantageous votes, Congress has been able to resort to increased levels of deficit spending.

Members of Congress, thus, have been free to respond to the concentrated pressures of spending interest groups—and reap the political advantages of doing so—without having to reap concomitant political disadvantages by reducing spending programs favored by some other spending interests or by expressly raising taxes.

The result is that spending continues inexorably to rise regardless of the genuine will of the people. This result is an essentially undemocratic and unresponsive process that enables Members of Congress to avoid ultimate accountability for their spending and taxing decisions. This institutional bias requires a constitutional solution.

The text of the balanced budget amendment follows:

TEXT OF THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT WITH CONSENSUS TAX AMENDMENT

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

SEC. 2. Any bill for raising taxes shall become law only if approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses of Congress by rollcall vote.

SEC. 3 Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to the Congress a proposed budget for the United States government for the fiscal year in which total outlays do not exceed total receipts.

SEC. 4. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

SEC. 5. Total receipts shall include all receipts of the United States except those derived from borrowing. Total outlays shall include all outlays of the United States except for those for repayment of debt principal.

SEC. 6. This article shall take effect beginning with fiscal year 1992 or with the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.

CONCEPTS OF THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

The balanced budget amendment proposes to overcome this spending bias by restoring the linkage between Federal spending and taxing decisions. It does not propose to read any specific level of spending or taxing forever into the Constitution and it does not propose to intrude the Constitution into the day-to-day spending and taxing decisions of the representative branch of the Government. It merely proposes to create a fiscal environment in which the competition between the tax-spenders and the taxpayers is a more equal one—one in which spending decisions will once more be constrained by available revenues.

Section 1 of the amendment would establish a balanced budget as a form of Federal fiscal policy. It could be overcome, however, by three-fifths votes in both Houses of Congress. Section 2 of the amendment would prohibit Congress from raising taxes and increasing the Federal Government's share of the national economy unless Members of Congress were willing to go on record.

This amendment is not a panacea for the economic problems of the Nation. The amendment is, however, a necessary step toward securing an environment more conducive to honest and accountable fiscal decisionmaking.

The balanced budget amendment represents both responsible economic policy and responsible constitutional policy. Passage of this resolution would constitute an appropriate response by Congress to the pending applications by nearly two-thirds of the States for a Constitutional Convention on this issue.

NEED FOR BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The primary purpose of this amendment is to correct a bias in the present political process in behalf of ever-increasing levels of Federal Government spending. Whether such spending is financed by higher taxes or new debt, it has woeful economic consequences. High interest rates, and the resulting decline in investment and productivity, as well as unacceptable levels of unemployment, all follow when the Government uses an excessive share of the Nation's resources, leaving too little for productive use by the private sector. If the Federal Reserve Board attempts to reduce these economic problems by increasing the money supply faster than increases in the supply of goods and services, inflation results.

While it is true that much of the enormous growth in Federal Government spending over the past two decades may be a response to evolving notions of the role of the public sector on the part of the American citizenry—that is, a genuine shift in the will and desire of the people—it is my contention that a substantial part of this growth stems from far less benign factors.

In short, the American political process is defective insofar as it is skewed toward artificially high levels of spending; that is, levels of spending that do not result from a genuine will and desire of the people. It is skewed in this direction because of the characteristics of the fiscal order that have developed in this country in recent decades. It is a fiscal order in which Members of Congress have every political incentive to spend money and almost no incentive to forego such spending. It is a fiscal order in which spending decisions have become increasingly divorced from the availability of revenues.

GRAMM-RUDMAN AND A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO BALANCE THE BUDGET

The enactment of Gramm-Rudman does not diminish the need for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. Gramm-Rudman does not purport to correct the structural bias in favor of deficit spending that would be offset by a constitutional amendment.

The proposed constitutional amendments to balance the Federal budget correct the inherent structural bias within our political system causing chronic deficit spending. Gramm-Rudman implements that fundamental principle over the next few years, but it neither corrects the systemic biases in our political system nor purports to make that policy permanent. Accordingly, even if Congress and the President successfully meet the worthy objectives of the Gramm-Rudman statute over the next few years, the symptoms may have been temporarily relieved, but the cancer will linger to flare up later.

The spending bias in our fiscal processes is caused by the absence of linkage between taxing and spending decisions. Members of Congress, however well-intentioned, simply do not have to cast votes in behalf of new taxes to order to accommodate new spending. Rather than casting politically disadvantageous votes, they can resort to increased levels of deficit spending funded by borrowing. Over the next few years, Gramm-Rudman effectively addresses the deficits caused by these systemic flaws, but a constitutional amendment is necessary to correct permanently the flaws.

In a democracy, a constitution establishes the structure of government by imposing restraints on the behavior of those who represent the people. For years, the body politic has suffered from the removal of constraints upon Congress imposed explicitly or assumed implicitly by the framers of the Constitution. Consequently the Federal Government has run a deficit in 27 of the past 28 years. Since 1970, the United States has incurred the 11 largest peacetime deficits in the history of the Nation with nine deficits over the past decade in excess of $50 billion. Consequently, Congress had to take the unprecedented steps prescribed by Gramm-Rudman. In this sense, Gramm-Rudman is itself a testament to the need for constitutional restraint. Thus, an amendment to the Constitution would reimpose, explicitly, those constraints as only a constitutional amendment can.

Although Gramm-Rudman statutorily mandates a balanced budget, a constitutional amendment is required for the following reasons:

Gramm-Rudman does not purport to correct the structural bias in favor of deficit spending that would be offset by a constitutional amendment.

Gramm-Rudman is intended only to deal with a temporary crisis, whereas a constitutional amendment corrects a bias that has caused deficits in 51 of the past 58 budget cycles. The deficit spending bias is not a problem that has lasted, nor will last, only a few years. In other words, the system is broke and will not be finally fixed in a few years. It demands a permanent constitutional solution.

Ultimately, no Congress can bind a succeeding Congress by simple statute. Spending and taxing pressures could cause Gramm-Rudman to be circumvented or changed. The success of deficit reduction efforts in the next few years and beyond may depend on stronger medicine than a statute can supply. Put another way, no statutory measure can contain provisions requiring a greater or more onerous voting rule for its repeal than for its adoption. Any balanced budget statute can be repealed, in whole or in part, by the simple expedient of adopting a new statute. Statutory limitations remain effective only as long as no majority coalition forms to overcome such statutory constraints. The virtue of a constitutional amendment is that it can invoke a stronger rule to overcome the spending bias.

Gramm-Rudman has put the Nation on the road to recovery. In the absence of constitutional underpinnings, however, Gramm-Rudman or any other statutory prescription faces challenges that may compromise enforcement.

By analogy: Several Senators could propose legislation to change statutory law relating to ratifying treaties, expelling Member of either House of Congress, or proposing constitutional amendments—all of which are current constitutional provisions requiring supermajority votes. This hypothetical legislation could set up elaborate mechanisms to ensure that treaties or constitutional amendment proposals get careful congressional scrutiny or that accused Members of Congress get due process. Even if such legislation were enacted, the new bill would not eliminate the need for the constitutional supermajority requirements in each of these areas. Similarly the current constitutional amendment proposals are intended to endow the voting of an unbalanced budget with the same solemn consideration now required for treaties. Because disconnecting outlays from revenues has consequences at least as sweeping as most treaties, a constitutional supermajority requirement is warranted regardless of current statutory attempts to balance the budget.

CONCENTRATED BENEFITS—DISPERSED COSTS

It is important to understand what some economists and political scientiest have described as the "concentrated benefit-dispersed cost" phenomenon. This describes the fact that the benefits of any given spending program normally are concentrated within a relatively small class of beneficiaries, while the costs of such a program are dispersed throughout a relatively large class of persons; that is, the taxpayers. Thus, those parties who benefit from a particular spending measure stand to benefit greatly while those who bear the costs are affected insignificantly. Arthur Burns, former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, described it in these terms:

> The proximate causes of this governmental bias are quite clear. In general, spending programs are more popular with people than higher taxes. The potential beneficiaries of a spending program are often a numerical minority, but they have a stronger incentive to keep informed, to organize, and to lobby for their favorite program than those who bear the cost have to oppose it. The rising cost of political campaigns and the concurrent proliferation of fundraising committees put intense pressure on legislators to vote for spending programs favored by such groups. We may, in fact, be entering an era in which governmental processes are overwhelmed by the naked demands of increasingly well-organized and effective interest groups. It is this concern that has led me to look with favor on even preemptory devices for offsetting the existing bias toward larger Federal spending and borrowing. (AEI Economist, April 1979.)

The competition, then, between the tax-spenders and the taxpayers is a highly unequal one; it is not at all surprising that the former should prevail so frequently. It is simply not worth the while of the individual taxpayer to spend as much time and effort to save himself a few cents or a few dollars on some program as it is for spending interests to secure millions or even billions of dollars for themselves. The spending interests tend to be intense and passionate in focusing upon individual spending measures likely to accrue to their benefit, while whose who logically would be most concerned about such spending, the taxpayers, tend to be diffuse and unorganized. Spending interests are politically visible and articulate and able to reward or punish legislators with their organized electoral support or nonsupport. Meanwhile, taxpayers are politically inarticulate, only barely able to perceive their self-interest in the context of isolated pieces of legislation. It is only when the spending programs are aggregated that the taxpayer begins to feel the full impact of such spending. Thus, it is only natural that legislators, however sincerely committed to fiscally responsible public policies, should be sensitive and responsible to the concerns of those who lobby for new or expanded spending initiatives. As Prof. Charles Baird of the University of California at Hayward has observed:

Whenever Government programs are considered one by one, there is a bias toward Government growth. Each program has a well-defined constituency that receives positive benefits therefrom. In many cases, the benefits from a particular program to a particular person represent a large part of that person's total income, while the tax cost to the beneficiary of that program is miniscule. Such direct beneficiaries of program A therefore are strongly motivated to organize work and lobby for the adoption and growth of the program. There is not countervailing incentive for taxpayers in general to organize, work, and lobby against program A in isolation because any individual taxpayer's share of program A is miniscule. Since elected representatives inevitably respond to lobbying efforts, there is a high probability that program A will be adopted even if the sum of the benefits therefrom are less than the sum of the costs.

The purpose of the balanced budget amendment is to create a more equal competition between spending interests and taxpayer interests by reducing the structural bias toward higher spending within the Federal fiscal system that contributes to the current imparity. By reducing the bias, and creating a more neutral environment within which this competition can take place, the representative processes will be more responsible and accountable to the genuine desires and interests of the public at large with respect to levels of public expenditures. As Prof. Allan Meltzer of Carnegie-Mellon University has observed:

Only by changing the ground rules under which spending decisions are made can we expect to obtain the outcome which people desire.

The proposed amendment addresses an important element of the spending bias: The access Members of Congress have to deficit spending. This enables Members of Congress to avoid having to vote new taxes in order to finance new spending.

A principal cause of the spending bias involves the virtually unlimited access that Members of Congress have to deficit spending. As the fundamental policy of budget balance has been disregarded in recent years, Members of Congress no longer are constrained in their ability to increase spending by the concomitant need to increase ordinary revenues. Permissible levels of spending no longer are defined as they traditionally have been, by levels of revenue available. In consequence, Members of Congress are free to obtain the resulting political advantages, without having either to: First, reduce spending for some other spending interest and incur the resulting political disadvantages, or second, increase tax revenues and incur the resulting political disadvantages.

Members of Congress do not have to reduce levels of spending for one program in order to accomplish increases in other programs because there is no effective limit as to how much Congress may spend in its budget. Once the traditional linkage has been severed between spending and revenues, there is not need for Members to establish priorities as between alternative spending proposals; each can be satisfied simply by increasing the level of the deficit. The availability of deficit spending enables Members to avoid the hard political decision of having to choose among spending proposals and thereby ensure for themselves some element of political disadvantage as well as political advantage.

Members of Congress do not have to increase revenues in order to accommodate increased spending because levels of spending no longer are related in any meaningful way to levels of revenue. Thus, not only is there no need for Congress to antagonize any other spending interest in the process of supporting a given spending measure, but there is no need to antagonize taxpayers generally by appearing to raise their tax burdens. Again, there is no element of political disadvantage Members of Congress are required to incur in order to reap the political disadvantages of responding to the spending interests.

In this respect, the availability of unlimited deficit spending allows the political costs of spending measures to be deferred in time, while enabling the political benefits to be enjoyed immediately. While the benefits of the measure usually will be understood immediately by its beneficiaries, the costs—in the form of higher future taxes, higher future inflation, and higher future interest rates—usually will be evident only at some remote time. Indeed, there may be no political costs whatsoever unless those who suffer from these economic ills are sophisticated enough to understand the cause-effect relationship between the earlier spending and the later symptoms.

APPROACH OF THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

In seeking to reduce the spending bias in our present system—the unlimited availability of deficit spending—the major purpose of the balanced budget amendment is to ensure that, under normal circumstances, votes by Congress for increased spending will be accompanied either by votes: First, to reduce other spending programs or second, to increase taxes to pay for such programs. For the first time since the abandonment of the traditional balance budget principle, Congress will be required to cast some politically difficult vote as a precondition for a politically attractive vote to increase spending.

Section 1 of the proposed amendment would address the spending bias—unlimited access by Members of Congress to deficit spending—by requiring a three-fifths vote of each House of Congress before the Federal Government could engage in such spending. Such a procedure would not prohibit deficit spending, but would simply reestablish, as a norm, a budget in balance rather than one in deficit. A consensus greater than a normal majority would be required to violate this norm. Unless such a consensus existed, Congress would be bound in its spending by its available revenues and would be forced to account for new spending in one program area by either reducing spending in another program area or by increased taxes. The political advantages resulting from support for new spending then would be matched, at least to some degree, by countervailing political disadvantages.

Section 2 of the proposed amendment would reinforce section 1 and further link tax spending and tax raising by requiring both Houses of Congress to approve any bill to increase revenues by a constitutional majority. In the absence clear constitutional majority and Presidential consent, a tax increase could not cause the public sector to grow at the expense of the private. Though while section 1 would ensure, as a norm, that Federal spending is matched by Federal revenues, section 2 would ensure that as such revenues are not raised without political accountability for Members of Congress. It would also make it less likely that the budget would be regularly balanced at increasingly high levels of taxation. Before Congress could make available to itself greater amounts of revenue for new spending initiatives, it would have to stand up in view of the public and place itself on record in behalf of such increased revenues. Section 3 requires the President to send a proposed budget to Congress which is in balance.

As a result, the amendment effects a subtle, but important, change in the psychology of the budget process. Under the present system, each spending interest, in effect, competes with the taxpayers to raise the total ante in the Federal Treasury. Under a system, however, in which some form of spending ceiling is in effect, these same interests suddenly will be competing with one another in order to ensure themselves a certain proportion of a fixed ante in the Federal Treasury. Not only will spending interests have to convince Congress that their favored programs merit funding at a certain level, but they will, in addition, have to establish the priority of their programs. A spending ceiling comprised of something beyond mere congressional self-restraint will force Members of Congress to view spending requests in terms of relative desirability, not simply in terms of whether or not a program is desirable at all. An element of competition among the spending interests will be introduced into the budget process, undoubtedly to the long-term interests of those who finance the spending programs favored by these interests.

Thus, the proposed amendment would make it easier for well-meaning, but beleaguered, Members of Congress to exercise fiscal responsibility in making their policy decision. There would be an external constraint something beyond their own ability to resist the importunities of the spending interest, upon which they could rely. As Prof. Roger Freeman of the Hoover Institution has noted:

It is not that Members of Congress do not wish to produce a balanced budget but that under the circumstances they can only do so at a grave political risk to their survival. They need a defense against excessive demands which allows them to say "no" to a multitude of pressure groups. Such a defense cannot be built by statute because any act of Congress can be amended or repealed by this Congress or the next. Only a constitutional amendment can impose credible and effective spending restraints.

Prof. James Buchanan goes on to elaborate:

The fault lies not in the bad intentions of elected politicians. The basic causes for the dramatic, and readily observable, shift in U.S. fiscal habits after World War II and notably after 1960 are not hard to identify. Keynesian teachings had succeeded in effectively repealing an important element of the unwritten fiscal Constitution within which American politics had been carried out throughout almost two centuries of its history.

In summary, the purpose of the balanced budget amendment is to eliminate the political process which allows Members to avoid having to vote for higher taxes in order to pay for higher spending and to establish a more genuinely neutral environment within which the budget competition occurs. The proposed amendment does not define what constitutes or what does not constitute a responsible budget, but only defines the institutional framework within which such budgets can be put together. Rather than Federal Government spending increasing inexorably, whatever the desires of the citizenry, the amendment would ensure that such spending is set at levels more reflective of their genuine desires.

S.J. RES. 10. Joint resolution to designate the month of May 1989, as "National Foster Care Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FOSTER CARE MONTH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today a joint resolution which would designate May 1989 as "National Foster Care Month."

It is acknowledged that a family environment with loving and caring parents is the ideal situation for children. However, in the United States there are hundreds of thousands of foster children who through no fault of their own have been deprived of this normal home relationship involving love, shelter, and other needs that are the basic necessities of all children. Foster parents volunteer their time, energy, and material resources 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, to help enable these children to develop into mature, responsible, and productive adults.

Our Nation's foster parents have a long and proud tradition of reaching out to those children who need them most. We need to publicly recognize these efforts and call attention to the vital needs of all foster children in the United States. Acknowledgement of the valuable contributions of foster care parents will provide for greater public awareness of and community support for these Americans.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this joint resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 10

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas there are more than 250,000 licensed foster families in the United States who temporarily provide guidance, emotional support, food, shelter, and nurture to children who cannot remain in their own home;

Whereas foster parents devotedly and unselfishly open their home and family life to children in need;

Whereas foster parents are a vital part in permanency planning to protect the best interests of a foster child;

Whereas foster parents work cooperatively with human service agencies and biological parents to strengthen family life;

Whereas foster parents must have the commitment of the national, State and local communities in terms of funding, support, and training; and

Whereas the National Foster Parent Association holds its annual training conference during the month of May, 1989: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of May 1989, is designated as "National Foster Care Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

S.J. Res. 11. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO FELONY CONVICTIONS OF OFFICIALS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would require forfeiture of office for Federal judges and certain other officers of the United States upon conviction of a felony.

Mr. President, I believe that the citizens of our country will agree that those who have been convicted of felonies should not occupy positions of trust and responsibility in our Government. Under current constitutional law, however, it is possible for certain officers of the United States who are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate to continue to receive a salary after such a felony conviction. This is unconscionable. In order to remove officers from the Federal payroll who are unwilling to resign, it is necessary that they be impeached, a process which can occupy valuable time and resources of the Congress.

Congress currently has the power to impeach officers of the Government who have committed treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. However, when the courts of this Nation find an official guilty of a serious crime, it should not be necessary for Congress to retry the officer prior to his or her removal from the Federal payroll.

The constitutional amendment which I am introducing will provide that any officer of the United States who is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, upon conviction of a felony, shall be removed from office and shall lose all salary and benefits arising from service in such office.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this proposal and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks:

S.J. RES. 11

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"Any officer of the United States appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, upon conviction of a felony, shall forfeit office and all prerogatives, benefits, or compensation thereof.".

S.J. Res. 12. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON A BALANCED BUDGET

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation to amend the U.S. Constitution to require the Federal Government to achieve and maintain a balanced budget.

This legislation is essentially similar to Senate Joint Resolution 11 which I introduced in the 100th Congress as well as an earlier bill which in March 1986 received 66 of 67 votes needed for Senate approval. Simply stated, this legislation calls for a constitutional amendment which requires that outlays not exceed receipts during any fiscal year. Also, the Congress would be allowed by three-fifths vote to adopt a specific level of deficit spending. Further, Congress could waive the amendment during time of war. The amendment would additionally require that any bill to increase taxes be approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses.

It is clear from the recent Presidential campaign that the budget deficit is a top priority with the American people and with the incoming Bush administration. The interest and involvement by our colleagues, the American citizens, and President-elect Bush speaks volumes as to the necessity of addressing our Nation's runaway fiscal policy.

Our Constitution has been amended only 26 times in 200 years. Amendment of our supreme law is a serious endeavor and should be reserved to protect the fundamental rights of our citizens or to ensure the survival or effectiveness of our system of government.

Mr. President, I believe that the effectiveness, indeed, the very survival of our system of government has become jeopardized by an irrational and irresponsible pattern that has developed and become entrenched in Federal fiscal policy over the last half-century. Because of this fiscal policy, the liberties and opportunities of our present and future citizens, which we have come to regard as sacred, are seriously threatened.

For many years, I have believed, as have many other Members of Congress, that the way to reverse this misguided direction of the fiscal Government is by amending the Constitution to mandate, except in extraordinary circumstances, balanced Federal budgets. We need this addition to our Constitution which establishes balanced budgets as a fiscal norm, rather than a fiscal abnormality.

In the past, we have been told by the opponents of the balanced budget constitutional amendment that self-imposed congressional restraint is what is needed to solve our fiscal woes—not a constitutional amendment. The fact, is, however, that in the face of large deficits, Congress has not proven that it is capable of such restraint. Congress has balanced the Federal budget only once in the last 28 years.

The level of annual budget deficits has grown enormously over this period of time. Since 1970, the United States incurred the largest peacetime deficits in the history of the Nation. Continued deficit spending by the Federal Government will undoubtedly lead the Nation into new periods of economic stagnation and decline. The tax burdens which today's deficits will place on future generations of American workers is staggering. We must reverse the fiscal course of the Federal Government, and I believe that a constitutional amendment is the best way to do it.

Mr. President, the balanced budget amendment proposal has the support of many of our colleagues in the Congress, a Congress which holds widely varying political views. Its supporters share an unyielding commitment to restoring sanity to a spending process which is out of control and hurling our Nation headlong toward economic disaster.

I urge my colleagues to support this proposal so we may submit this important constitutional amendment to the States for ratification.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 12

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each Hosue concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

"SECTION 2. Any bill for raising taxes shall become law only if approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses of Congress by rollcall vote.

"SECTION 3. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

"SECTION 4. Total receipts shall include all receipts of the United States except those derived from borrowing. Total outlays shall include all outlays of the United States except for those for repayment of debt principal.

"SECTION 5. This article shall take effect beginning with fiscal year 1992 or with the second fiscal year beginning after the ratification, whichever is later.".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, throughout most of the Nation's history, the requirement of budget balancing under normal economic circumstances was considered to be a sound and fundamental policy. Consequently, for approximately 150 years of our history—from 1789 to 1932—balanced budgets or surplus budgets were the norm. While budget procedures had little of their present organization, the concept of a balanced budget was accepted widely as the hallmark of fiscal responsibility. Those deficits that did occur—during wartime or during the most severe recessions—normally were compensated for by subsequent surpluses.

Between 1932 and 1960 the rigid rule of annual balanced budgets gave way to a fiscal policy in which balanced budgets remained an overall objective but in which deficit spending nevertheless was viewed as a tool occasionally useful to effect appropriate economic results. New economic theories had emerged that placed great weight upon the ability of the Federal Government to manage fiscal policy through deficits and surpluses.

However, a real turning point in the history of U.S. fiscal policies occurred during the 1960's. Even the Keynesian objective of balancing surplus years with deficit years succumbed to the idea of regular, annual uncompensated for deficits.

During the past two decades, the Federal Government has run deficits in all but a single year. The deficits have come during good economic times, and they have come during bad economic times. They have come from Presidents who have pledged themselves to balanced budgets, and they have come from Presidents whose fiscal priorities were elsewhere. They have come from Presidents of both parties.

Even more alarming, the magnitude of these deficits has increased enormously. For the 7 fiscal years ending in 1967, the total deficit was approximately $91 billion. For the 7 fiscal years ending in 1981, the total deficit was approximately $450 billion. The total national debt stands just over $2.6 trillion, with nearly two-thirds of that total incurred during the past decade alone.

MAGNITUDE OF FEDERAL DEBT

The number $2.6 trillion is to clean and simple sounding to communicate the implications of our staggering debt. In 1975, before this recent borrowing spree, the Federal debt amounted to approximately $2,500 per person and the annual interest charges cost roughly $250 per taxpayer. Only 1 year ago, the Federal debt amounted to over $10,000 per person. By 1992, according to 1988 Congressional Budget Office projections, the debt could reach $13,500 per person. Even if the Government adheres to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit ceilings, tens of billions of dollars will be added to the national debt. These last figures—which must be considered optimistic—would mean a fourfold increase in per-capita debt. This gives a better picture of the actual magnitude of the debt. It still does not describe, however, the human implications. The human implications are that our children are being shackled with an insurmountable burden as a result of our largess. Over time, the disproportionate burdens imposed on today's children and their children by a continuing pattern of deficits will include some combination of the following:

First, increased taxes; second, reduced public welfare benefits; third, reduced public pensions; fourth, reduced expenditures on infrastructure and other public investments; fifth, diminished capital formation, job creation, productivity enhancement, and real wage growth in the private economy; sixth, higher interest rates; seventh, higher inflation; eighth, increased indebtedness to and economic dependence on foreign creditors; and ninth, increased risk or default on the Federal debt.

Perhaps the most significant effect of today's unrestrained borrowing, however, will be a reduction in the political choices available to future governments of this Nation. From 1952 through 1975, the interest cost on the Federal debt consumed between 6.7 and 8.3 percent of annual revenues. Since then, that percentage has risen steadily. By 1988, interest costs consumed 16.7 percent of annual revenues.

In fiscal year 1988, 85.4 percent of Federal Government expenditures were financed by tax revenues, and the remaining 22 percent by borrowing. Of this situation, one could say that the American people were getting a dollar's worth of government for every 78 cents' worth of taxes. But at what cost? Future taxpayers—including today's children—face the sad prospect of receiving 78 cent's worth of government for every dollar's worth of taxes.

Efforts to secure a constitutional rule to require a balanced Federal budget and to limit the growth of Federal spending have intensified as the Federal Government's persistent failure to balance its budget has produced debt of over $2.6 trillion and as the Federal share of the economy has continued to increase.

In a large measure, the Nation's economic problems are attributable to these facts. Unacceptable levels of inflation and unemployment, as well as enormous foreign trade imbalances, can be traced directly or indirectly to the fiscal policies and practices of the National Government.

This balanced budget amendment I am introducing today will reestablish constitutional limitations upon Federal spending and deficit practices that existed in earlier years through an array of formal and informal principles and understandings and which have been eroded over the course of recent years. The abandonment of the fundamental policy requirement of balanced budgets, the passage of the 16th amendment, and the development of new judicial doctrines concerning the Federal spending authority are some of the features that have contributed to the present situation in which there is insufficient external constraint upon the ability of Congress to spend.

Specifically, the proposed amendment addresses a serious spending bias in the present fiscal process arising from the fact that Members of Congress do not have to cast votes in behalf of new taxes in order to accommodate new spending programs. Rather than having to cast such politically disadvantageous votes, Congress has been able to resort to increased levels of deficit spending.

Members of Congress, thus, have been free to respond to the concentrated pressures of spending interest groups—and reap the political advantages of doing so—without having to reap concomitant political disadvantages by reducing spending programs favored by some other spending interests or by expressly raising taxes.

The result is that spending continues inexorably to rise regardless of the genuine will of the people. This result is an essentially undemocratic and unresponsive process that enables Members of Congress to avoid ultimate accountability for their spending and taxing decisions. This institutional bias requires a constitutional solution.

CONCEPTS OF THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

The balanced budget amendment proposes to overcome this spending bias by restoring the linkage between Federal spending and taxing decisions. It does not propose to read any specific level of spending or taxing forever into the Constitution and it does not propose to intrude the Constitution into the day-to-day spending and taxing decisions of the representative branch of the Government. It merely proposes to create a fiscal environment in which the competition between the tax spenders and the taxpayers is a more equal one—one in which spending decisions will once more be constrained by available revenues.

Section 1 of the amendment would establish a balanced budget as a form of Federal fiscal policy. It could be overcome, however, by three-fifths votes in both Houses of Congress. Section 2 of the amendment would prohibit Congress from raising taxes and increasing the Federal Government's share of the national economy unless Members of Congress were willing to go on record.

This amendment is not a panacea for the economic problems of the Nation. The amendment is, however, a necessary step toward securing an environment more conducive to honest and accountable fiscal decision making.

The balanced budget amendment represents both responsible economic policy and responsible constitutional policy. Passage of this resolution would constitute an appropriate response by Congress to the pending applications by nearly two-thirds of the states for a constitutional convention on this issue.

GRAMM-RUDMAN AND A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO BALANCE THE BUDGET

The enactment of Gramm-Rudman does not diminish the need for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. Gramm-Rudman does not purport to correct the structural bias in favor of deficit spending that would be offset by a constitutional amendment.

The proposed constitutional amendments to balance the Federal budget correct the inherent structural bias within our political system causing chronic deficit spending. Gramm-Rudman implements that fundamental principle over the next few years, but it neither corrects the systemic biases in our political system nor purports to make that policy permanent. Accordingly, even if Congress and the President successfully meet the worthy objectives of the Gramm-Rudman statute over the next few years, the symptoms may have been temporarily relieved, but the cancer will linger to flare up later.

The spending bias in our fiscal processes is caused by the absence of linkage between taxing and spending decisions. Members of Congress, however well-intentioned, simply do not have to cast votes in behalf of new taxes in order to accommodate new spending. Rather than casting politically disadvantageous votes, they can resort to increased levels of deficit spending funded by borrowing. Over the next few years, Gramm-Rudman effectively addresses the deficits caused by these systemic flaws, but a constitutional amendment is necessary to correct permanently the flaws.

In a democracy, a constitution establishes the structure of government by imposing restraints on the behavior of those who represent the people. For years, the body politic has suffered from the removal of constraints upon Congress imposed explicitly or assumed implicitly by the framers of the Constitution. Consequently the Federal Government has run a deficit in 27 of the past 28 years. Since 1970, the United States has incurred the 11 largest peacetime deficits in the history of the Nation with nine deficits over the past decade in excess of $50 billion. Consequently, Congress had to take the unprecedented steps prescribed by Gramm-Rudman. In this sense, Gramm-Rudman is itself a testament to the need for constitutional restraint. Thus, an amendment to the Constitution would reimpose, explicitly, those constraints as only a constitutional amendment can.

Although Gramm-Rudman statutorily mandates a balanced budget, a constitutional amendment is required for the following reasons:

Gramm-Rudman does not purport to correct the structural bias in favor of deficit spending that would be offset by a constitutional amendment.

Gramm-Rudman is intended only to deal with a temporary crisis, whereas a constitutional amendment corrects a bias that has caused deficits in 51 of the past 58 budget cycles. The deficit spending bias is not a problem that has lasted, nor will last, only a few years. In other words, the system is broke and will not be finally fixed in a few years. It demands a permanently constitutional solution.

Ultimately, no Congress can bind a succeeding Congress by simple statute. Spending and taxing pressures could cause Gramm-Rudman to be circumvented or changed. The success of deficit reduction efforts in the next few years and beyond may depend on stronger medicine than a statute can supply. Put another way, no statutory measure can contain provisions requiring a greater or more onerous voting rule for its repeal than for its adoption. Any balanced budget statute can be repealed, in whole or in part, by the single expedient of adoptng a new statute. Statutory limitations remain effective only as long as no majority coalition forms to overcome such statutory constraints. The virtue of a constitutional amendment is that it can invoke a stronger rule to overcome the spending bias.

Gramm-Rudman has put the Nation on the road to recovery. In the absence of constitutional underpinnings, however, Gramm-Rudman or any other statutory prescription faces challenges that may compromise enforcement.

By analogy: Several Senators could propose legislation to change statutory law relating to ratifying treaties, expelling Members of either House of Congress, or proposing constitutional amendments—all of which are current constitutional provisions requiring supermajority votes. This hypothethical legislation could set up elaborate mechanisms to ensure that treaties or constitutional amendment proposals get careful congressional scrutiny or that accused Members of Congress get due process. Even if such legislation were enacted, the new bill would not eliminate the need for the constitutional supermajority requirements in each of these areas. Similarly the current constitutional amendment proposals are intended to endow the voting of an unbalanced budget with the same solemn consideration now required for treaties. Because disconnecting outlays from revenues has consequences at least as sweeping as most treaties, a constitutional supermajority requirement is warranted regardless of current statutory attempts to balance the budget.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, as an original cosponsor of a proposed amendment to the Constitution mandating a balanced Federal budget.

As Congress once again turns its attention to the budget, no time is more apt to redouble our efforts to bring about a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. If there exists a consensus on any matter it is on the need to put our fiscal house in order. No budget solution will be complete, however, unless and until we take action to remove deficit spending as a public policy option.

The language of the amendment offered today is simple and straightforward—it requires merely that outlays shall not exceed receipts. Also, the amendment provides important safeguards in case of exigency by allowing deficit spending during time of declared war and when Congress consents by a three-fifths vote of both Houses.

This amendment is a responsible and necessary course to bring fiscal responsibility to a nation in need. I urge my colleagues to help us start the amendment process by supporting this proposal.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. GARN, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. HEFLIN):

S.J. Res. 13. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to voluntary school prayer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO SCHOOL PRAYER

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing the voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment. This bill is identical to Senate Joint Resolution 73 which I introduced in the 98th Congress at the request of the President and reintroduced in the 99th and 100th Congress.

This proposal has received strong support from our colleagues on both sides of the aisle and, as President REAGAN and President-Elect BUSH have emphasized, is of vital importance to our Nation. It would restore the right to pray voluntarily in the public schools—a right which was freely exercised under our Constitution until the 1960's, when the Supreme Court ruled to the contrary.

Also, in 1985, the Supreme Court ruled an Alabama statute unconstitutional which authorized teachers in public schools to provide "a period of silence * * * for mediation or voluntary prayer" at the beginning of each school day. As I stated when that opinion was issued and repeat again—the Supreme Court has too broadly interpreted the establishment clause of the first amendment and, in doing so, has incorrectly infringed on the rights of those children—and their parents—who wish to observe a moment of silence for religious or other purposes.

Until the Supreme Court ruled in the Engle and Abington School District decisions, the establishment clause of the first amendment was generally understood to prohibit the Federal Government from officially approving, or holding in special favor, any particular religious faith or denomination. In crafting that clause, our Founding Fathers sought to prevent what had originally caused many colonial Americans to emigrate to this country—an official, State religion. At the same time, they sought, through the free exercise clause, to guarantee to all Americans the freedom to worship God without Government interference or restraint. In their wisdom, they recognized that true religious liberty precludes the Government from both forcing and preventing worship.

As Supreme Court Justice William Douglas once stated: "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being." Nearly every President since George Washington has proclaimed a day of public prayer. Moreover, we, as a Nation, continue to recognize the Deity in our Pledge of Allegiance by affirming that we are a Nation "under God". Our currency is inscribed with the motto, "In God We Trust". In this body, we open the Senate and begin our workday with the comfort and stimulus of voluntary group prayers—such a practice has been recently upheld as constitutional by the Supreme Court. It is absurd that the opportunity for the same beneficial experience is denied to the boys and girls who attend public schools. This situation simply does not comport with the intentions of the framers of the Constitution and is, in fact, antithetical to the rights of our youngest citizens to freely exercise their respective religions. It should be changed, without further delay.

The Congress should swiftly pass this resolution and send it to the States for ratification. This amendment to the Constitution would clarify that it does not prohibit vocal, voluntary prayer in the public schools and other public institutions. It emphatically states that no person may be required to participate in any prayer. The Government would be precluded from drafting school prayers. This well-crafted amendment enjoys the support of an overwhelming number of Americans. During the 98th Congress, we were only 11 votes short of the 67 necessary for approval in the Senate.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support prompt consideration and approval of this bill during the 101st Congress and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 13

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the State by the Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or by any State to participate in prayer. Neither the United States nor any State shall compose the words of any prayer to be said in public schools.".

By Mr. THURMOND:

S.J. Res. 14. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to allow the President to veto items of appropriations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO A LINE-ITEM VETO

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a constitutional amendment which would give authority to the President to disapprove specific items of appropriation in any budget bill submitted to him. This idea has been commonly known by the Congress as "line item veto."

The fiscal policy of our Nation is much like a house of cards—there is little foundation. According to the Congressional Budget Office, the United States is over $2 trillion in debt. Our Nation's deficit for 1988 was a staggering $155 billion. We are mortgaging the future for generations to come.

Time and again, the Congress passes appropriation measures totaling billions and billions of dollars. Tucked away in many of these bills are items representing billions of dollars of expenditures which would have very little chance of passing in their own right. Yet the President has no discretion to weed out these unnecessary expenditures and must approve the bill in its entirety or the meritorious appropriation items will die.

Presidential authority for line item veto is a badly needed fiscal tool which would go a long way in reducing and restraining excessive appropriations.

Mr. President, 43 Governors currently have, in one form or another, the power to reduce or eliminate items or provisions in appropriations bills. My State of South Carolina provides this authority and I found it most useful during my service as Governor in the late 1940's. I firmly believe that the President should be given the same authority that 43 Governors now have to check unbridled spending.

Along with this constitutional amendment, legislation will be introduced to statutorily give line item veto authority to the President. Scholars have debated the constitutionality of the statutory approach granting line item veto.

In any event, our colleagues have a choice. Supporting this resolution proposing a constitutional amendment or the statutory approach will send a clear message to the American public that we are making a serious effort to get our fiscal house in order.

During the recent Presidential campaigns, President Bush spoke many times of his strong belief that line item veto authority was needed for the President to curtail runaway Federal spending. He is absolutely right and the American people deserve no less than our support and swift passage of a constitutional amendment granting the President line item veto authority.

I urge my colleagues to join as cosponsors and ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 14

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"The President may disapprove any item of appropriation in any Act or joint resolution. If an Act or joint resolution is approved by the President, any item of appropriation contained therein which is not disapproved shall become law. The President shall return with his objections any item of appropriation disapproved to the House in which the Act or joint resolution containing such item originated. The Congress may, in the manner prescribed under section 7 of article I for Acts disapproved by the President, reconsider any item of appropriation disapproved under this article.".

S.J. Res. 15. Joint Resolution to designate the second Sunday in October of 1989 as "National Children's Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CHILDREN'S DAY

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, we often refer to children as our greatest resource, yet we do not honor them with a special day of the year. Today I am introducing a resoultion declaring the second Sunday in October as "National Children's Day."

Unfortunately, the pressures of modern society and unfavorable economic circumstances often pull families apart. Our Nation is experiencing many social problems—such as illiteracy, teenage pregnancy, and drug abuse. Peer influence and other pressures often confront young people with many difficult decisions. It is important for parents to spend time listening to their children and teaching them to make responsible decisions.

A National Children's Day would give our Nation the opportunity to recognize our children's achievements and their contributions to our world. It also would be a time for parents, teachers, and religious and community leaders to emphasize to children the importance of family life, education, and spiritual values.

Children play a very special role in this complex world. They are the hope and future of our country. It is important for them to know they are loved and appreciated. However, while we celebrate Mother's Day and Father's Day, we do not have a day to honor children. For this reason, Mr. President, I hope our colleagues will join me in sponsoring this resolution to declare the second Sunday in October as National Children's Day.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 15

Whereas the people of the United States should celebrate children as the most valuable asset of the Nation;

Whereas children represent the future, hope, and inspiration of the United States;

Whereas the children of the United States should not be allowed to feel that their ideas and dreams will be stifled because adults in the United States do not take time to listen;

Whereas many children face crisis of grave proportions, especially as they enter adolescent years;

Whereas it is important for parents to spend time listening to their children on a daily basis;

Whereas modern society and economic needs often pull the family apart;

Whereas each family is encouraged to set aside a special time for all family members to remain at home;

Whereas adults in the United States should have an opportunity to reminisce on their youth to recapture some of the fresh insight, innocence, and dreams that such adults may have lost through the years;

Whereas the designation of a day to commemorate the children of the United States will provide an opportunity to emphasize to children the importance of developing an ability to make the choices necessary to distance themselves from impropriety;

Whereas the designation of a day to commemorate the children of the Nation will emphasize to the people of the United States the importance of the role of the child within the family;

Whereas the people of the United States should emphasize to children the importance of family life, education, and spiritual qualities; and

Whereas parents, teachers, and community and religious leaders should celebrate the children of the United States, whose questions, laugher, and tears are important to the existence of the United States: Now therefore be it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second Sunday in October of 1989 is designated as "National Children's Day", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S.J. Res. 17. Joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to limit congressional terms; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO LIMIT CONGRESSIONAL TERMS

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to limit the number of congressional terms. I believe that this amendment is necessary to restore faith in and assure the sound operation of our representative system of Government.

This issue has been considered and reconsidered by this body since the beginning of its history. The question was first brought before the Congress as early as 1777. I myself have introduced such an amendment in every Congress since the 95th. I am once again introducing this amendment because I believe that the justifications for limiting the number of congressional terms are more compelling today than they have ever been.

At the time of its evolution, the seniority system served a useful purpose as the organizational mechanism for the two Chambers, with responsibilities within the committee and subcommittee structure allocated on the basis of tenure in office. Undoubtedly, this system has facilitated Congress for many years. Today, however, the seniority system hinders, rather than helps, the ideal of equal representation of individuals and States which lies at the heart of our democracy.

The current seniority system, with unlimited numbers of possible congressional terms, by its very nature makes us as Senators unequal. Senators, merely by virtue of tenure in office, are able to gain powerful positions as chairs of standing committees. As zealous advocates of the States they represent, Senators in such positions are able to secure benefits for their home States out of proportion to a rational allocation of Federal resources. Junior Senators, on the other hand, are at a competitive disadvantage from the first day on the job and may be unable to shepherd worthy legislation through the complex legislative process. Because we as Senators are not equals, our constituents are also not on an equal footing. This state of affairs goes against the ideal of equal representation embedded in the roots of our democracy.

My personal involvement with this issue is well known to this body. I have just been elected to my third term in office, after having worked to limit the number of congressional terms to two since my first days as a Senator. At the end of my second term, I was faced with a Hobson's choice: set an example by stepping down after two terms as I originally intended, without having achieved the goal of passing through the amendment I reintroduce today; or appear to deviate from my own ideals and run for a third term. The first alternative would have put my State of Arizona at an extreme disadvantage. My leaving, on the heels of the retirement of my distinguished former colleague the Honorable Barry Goldwater, would have left my State with 2 years of Senatorial seniority. To me, the choice was difficult, but clear. The very seniority system which I have been fighting to curtail forced me to stay in the game for the good of the State I represent.

The passage of this amendment to limit the number of congressional terms remains my determined goal, and is even more pressing of an issue today than it ever has been. We must put an end to a system which makes our Government less, rather than more, democratic. We must do all we can to ensure that our Government is as representative as possible. This goal can only be reached by passage of the amendment I propose today. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 17

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. No person shall be elected to the Senate for more than two full terms. No person shall be elected to the House of Representatives for more than seven full terms.

"SECTION 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1 of this article, any person may serve not more than fourteen years as a Senator or not more than fifteen years as a Representative.

SECTION 3. For purposes of determining eligibility for election under section 1 of this article, no election occuring before the date of this article is ratified shall be taken into account. For purposes of determining years of service under section 2 of this article, no service of any part of a term of office by a Senator or Representative elected to such term before the date this article is ratified shall be taken into account."●

By Mr. THURMOND:

S.J. Res. 18. Joint resolution to authorize the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich to erect a monument to General Draza Mihailovich in Washington, DC, or its environs, in recognition of the role he played in saving the lives of more than 500 United States airmen in Yugoslavia during World War II; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

MEMORIAL HONORING GENERAL DRAZA MIHAILOVICH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a bill which will authorize the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Draza Mihailovich to erect a monument in Washington.

The reason for having such a monument stems back to World War II. During that war the United States and Great Britain initially supported the nationalist resistance movement in Yugoslavia which was led by General Draza Mihailovich. Due to a tragic combination of errors and mistaken information, the Allies withdrew their support for Mihailovich at the end of 1943 and backed the Communist resistance movement of Marshal Tito.

Despite his abandoment by the Allies and despite the merciless war waged against him by both the Communists and the Nazis during 1944, General Draza Mihailovich and his forces, known as the Chetniks, succeeded in rescuing some 500 American airmen who were safely evacuated from Nazi-occupied Yugoslavia to Italy.

In 1948, President Harry S. Truman awarded posthumously the Legion of Merit to General Mihailovich for his heroics in rescuing American airmen and for his larger services to the Allied cause. Unfortunately, the American public was unaware of this award since the State Department, fearful of offending the sensitivities of the Yugoslovian Communist Government, made the award to Mihailovich secret for almost 20 years.

Since that time, a group of American airmen have organized themselves into a National Committee composed of American airmen rescued by General Mihailovich. This fine organization has launched a movement to build a memorial in Washington, DC, dedicated to the man who saved their lives: This effort has been ongoing for some time now, with the support of many Members of Congress. I can think of no better way to discharge this debt than to authorize these airmen to erect the monument they have in mind.

Mr. President, in voicing my support for this effort, I want to emphasize the fact that this project is to be financed, not by the American taxpayers, but through the fundraising efforts of the airmen's group. All costs for the construction and maintenance of this memorial will be borne by the private sector.

This legislation is virtually identical to previous measures that have been approved overwhelmingly in the Senate.

Mr. President, the airmen who seek authority to have this monument erected do not wish to make political noises that would offend the present Government of Yugoslavia. They seek only to acknowledge their deep sense of gratitude to a man who was instrumental in rescuing nearly 500 downed American flyers during World War II. They merely want the simple recognition that would be imparted by the erection of a General Mihailovich monument.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 18

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subject to authorization by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to section 2 and the provisions of Public Law 99-652, the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich is authorized to establish a monument on public grounds in the District of Columbia or its environs, to honor General Draza Mihailovich for the role he played in saving the lives of more than five hundred United States airmen in Yugoslavia during World War II.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich, shall select with the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Planning Commission a suitable site on grounds owned by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia or its environs for erection of the monument referred to in the first section of this joint resolution.

(b) The National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich shall be responsible for the development of the design and plans of such monument, which shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission. If the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, or the National Capital Planning Commission fails to approve or make specific objection to such design and plans within ninety days after submission, such approval shall be deemed to be given.

(c) Neither the United States nor the District of Columbia shall bear any expense in the erection of the monument other than expenses incurred in the process of site selection and approval of design and plans.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior shall permit ground breaking for construction of the monument only after he determines that sufficient funds are available to complete the monument in accordance with the approved design and plans.

SEC. 4. The authority conferred by this joint resolution shall lapse unless the construction of the monument begins within two years after the date of the approval of this joint resolution.

SEC. 5. The maintenance and care of the monument erected under this joint resolution shall be the responsibility of the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich.

By Mr. BURNS (for himself and Mr. BAUCUS):

S.J. Res. 19. Joint resolution to designate November 8, 1989, as "Montana Centennial Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONTANA CENTENNIAL DAY

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to designate November 8, 1989, as "Montana Centennial Day." This is a special day for me as I look forward to working with such a distinguished body of men and women who have dedicated their lives, their talent, and their well-being to our Nation.

As this is a special day for me, 1989 is a special year for my home State of Montana. One hundred years ago, Montana was admitted to the Union.

Montana was the 41st State admitted on November 8, 1889, by President Harrison. Montana State delegates produced a constitution and approved it by popular vote, 24,676 for to 2,274 against on October 1, 1889.

The State was first known as the Treasure State, alluding to the deposits of gold and silver and other precious metals.

But the real treasures were discovered by the great herds of cattle that noved northward from Kansas, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Texas toward a sea of grass and water.

Still known as the Treasure State but more familiar now as the "Big Sky Country," it's the 4th largest State after Alaska, Texas, and California encompassing about 146,000 square miles.

Roughly 800,000 call Montana home—miners, loggers, farming, ranching, tourism—life in Montana represents a personal freedom. The free spirit of the cowboy still lives in the spectacular scenery.

From the eastern prairies to the rugged beauty of the Rockies in the West, Montana is truly the land of the Big Sky.

I urge all Senators to join me in cosponsoring Montana Centennial Day, November 8, 1989. Thank you, Mr. President.

I ask unanimous consent to have the joint resolution printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 19

Whereas for a century the people of Montana have made substantial contributions to the economic and social well-being of the United States of America;

Whereas the State of Montana, known as "Big Sky Country", with wide vistas and scenic mountains, is a State of incomparable beauty; and

Whereas the history of Montana is forever intertwined with the history of westward expansion in the United States of America;

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That November 8, 1989, is designated as "Montana Centennial Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation acknowledging the economic, social, and historic contributions of the people of Montana to the United States of America over the past century.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to thank the new Senator from Montana, and welcome him to the Senate and the 101st Congress. I would also like to wish him a Happy Birthday today.

Mr. President, 1989 marks the 100th year of Statehood for Montana and designating November 8—the day the territorial Governor received a telegran confirming President Harrison's proclamation creating Montana as the 41st State and Joseph K. Toole became its first Governor. To designate November 8, 1989, as Montana Centennial Day is only fitting considering the colorful history and the rich contributions Montana has given to the rest of the Nation—from its people to its wealth of natural resources.

Montana, Big Sky Country. As Montana historian K. Ross Toole referred to home, "Montana: High, Wide and Handsome."

French trappers may have visited the Montana area as early as the 1740's. The United States obtained most of what is now Montana as part of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. The northwest part was gained by treaty with Great Britain in 1846. At various times, part of Montana was in the territories of Louisiana, Missouri, Nebraska, Dakota, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho.

In 1841, Jesuit missionaries established St. Mary Mission, the first attempt at a permanent settlement, near what is now Stevensville. In 1847, the American Fur Co. built Fort Benton on the Missouri River. The town that developed there is Montana's oldest. Montana is a land of immigrants from Europe and the Orient and a land where native Americans are a proud part of our heritage.

It is a land of great people—pioneering, enduring people with a sense of optimism and community, people who helped define the American character, people such as Mike Mansfield and Jeanette Rankin, copper kings W.A. Clark and Marcus Daly, Chief Joseph, and artist Charlie Russell.

Montana, though sparsely populated, represents a great portion of the resource base of our country: metals and minerals, oil, timber, water, and power.

This is a land where the Plains meet the Rockies. It's a land of sturdy people, a part of America's past and part of her future.

Montana is a land of extreme beauty and extreme hardship, a land of hope and a land of tragedy, from the bitter winters of the Northern Plains to the strange, unearthly beauty of Yellowstone National Park; from the cradle of women's suffrage to Custer's blunder at the Little Big Horn.

Mr. President, this resolution is only the kickoff of what will be a yearlong celebration of events such as a centennial celebration on the Mall, Montana art and film festivals, and the Centennial Minute, a weekly speech on Montana history that I will give here on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, there is a long history of commemorative coins being issued for the centennial of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Missouri, Texas, the centennial of the Wisconsin Territory, the 75th anniversary of California, and the 150th anniversary of Vermont.

However, not a single commemorative honors a city or State in the Intermountain West. That is why I will introduce in just a few days legislation that will call for the U.S. Mint to strike a $5 commemorative coin in recognition of the centennials of Montana, Idaho, North and South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming.

The Northwest centennial commemorative coin thus would be an important reminder and recognition of the youth of our Nation, of its western heritage and of continued vitality.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this joint resolution and invite them to come to Montana and join us as we celebrate our 100th birthday.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S.J. Res. 21. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the right to life; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON THE RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce an amendment to the Constitution regarding the controversial issue of abortion.

Mr. President, in the history of human rights there has never been such an important document as the Constitution of the United States, created and placed into practice by our forefathers. The rights that it ensures are essential for the present as well as the future. Limiting government power is an objective that must be maintained to insure that no single branch of government exceeds its autorized power. The Constitution should not be amended, in the words of the framers, for "light and transient causes." But innocent human life is a precious right that needs special protection. Barring any new high court decision, this can only be accomplished by initiating an amendment to the Constitution.

Sixteen years ago, the Supreme Court of the United States cast a decision that I believe was incorrect in its substance and legal justification.

Sixteen years ago, the Court ruled unconstitutional State laws prohibiting the extermination of unborn innocent human life. Today more than 20 million futures were decided before they had a chance to take part in the American dream.

Mr. President, the technology in this age has advanced so much since 1973 that the scientific basis for the court case of Roe versus Wade has been undermined. We can now examine a future life not fully developed within the womb. We should, therefore, reexamine the 1973 Court decision in light of these new advances. With this new knowledge, we have a chance to stop the needless slaying of innocent American unborn life. Child abuse has risen to an all time high. The courts thought that with legalized abortion, the abuse would decrease since unwanted pregnancies could be "taken care of." The courts were wrong. What chance does a nation have to advance when it doesn't know how to value the life that its future is depending on? Can you picture the future of a country whose own people cannot distinguish between respect and responsibility?

In 1973 the right of privacy was declared as a liberty protected by the 14th amendment. The Court created a broad general right to privacy by reading the 1st, 3d, 4th, 5th, 9th, and 14th amendments together. Doing so, they overturned a State law basing their decision not on the Constitution nor the bill of rights, which the Court is to interpret and protect, but upon the authority of the Court's 1965 decision in the Griswold case. It stated that "privacy" was a fundamental right, secured against all but the most "compelling" of State interests, and then concluded that the State did not have a sufficient interest in protecting human beings that were not yet born. Why wouldn't a State be interested in its future proteges? Without unborn life there certainly would not be the life which the State is bound to protect.

The 5th and 14th amendments specifically prohibit Federal and State governments from depriving "any person of life—without due process of law." Have we forgotten the statement in the Declaration of Independence "that all men are created equal? That they are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights. That among these are life—" and that "to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men—"?

Mr. President, in our constitutional Republic we have democratic institutions to which we elect Americans to make laws to secure the rights promised in the Declaration of Independence and our Constitution. The unelected courts have a duty to not create law, but to interpret the laws made by elected representatives. Congress never legalized abortion. Nevertheless, the Court usurped congressional power and created an abortion right.

Mr. President, we must now correct the mistake made by the judicial system. We cannot ignore the medical proof that an unborn child is in fact a real human being. He/she has the same rights that you and I have. We must defend these rights of the defenseless, helpless, and unborn.

Mr. President, we must face this issue now and we can no longer wait. We must secure the constitutional rights for all persons, whether born or unborn. I therefore propose this resolution and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 21

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution only if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of its submission by the Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. With respect to the right to life, the word 'person' as used in this article and in the Fifth and Fourteen Amendments applies to all human beings regardless of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, and includes the unborn offspring of any such human, at every stage of the biological development of such offspring.

"SECTION 2. No unborn person shall be deprived of life by any person, except that nothing in this article shall prohibit a law permitting only those medical procedures required to prevent the death of the mother.

"SECTION 3. The Congress and the several States shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.".

By Mr. EXON:

S.J. Res. 22. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to Federal budget procedures; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO FEDERAL BUDGET PROCEDURES

● Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce my first piece of legislation in the 101st Congress. This legislation is a proposed constitutional amendment to require the President to submit and the Congress to enact a balanced Federal budget. I chose this legislation as my first bill of the new Congress because deficit reduction must be the first priority of this new Congress and the new administration.

On the day that President Reagan entered office in 1981, the accumulated national debt was $931.3 billion. As President Reagan leaves office the accumulated national debt exceeds $2.68 trillion. Thanks to the misguided economic policies of borrow and borrow, spend and spend, President Bush inherits an accumulated national debt nearly three times larger than the debt left for President Reagan.

Fifteen cents of every tax dollar now goes to pay interest on the national debt. This year, the cost of interest on the national debt will exceed the size of the budget deficit. Put another way, if it were not for our past deficit spending, the Federal budget would be balanced.

Mr. President, many will ask, "Why worry about the deficit?" Well, without the rose colored glasses of the last 8 years, concern about Federal deficits comes clearly into focus. Too often overlooked is that the slow growth economy of the last 6 years was preceded by the deepest recession since the Great Depression. The recovery which followed was very uneven. The 1982 recession was followed by what one journalist aptly described as a series of "rolling recessions." Economic hardship rolled through the Rust Belt, the Farm Belt, Silicon Valley, and the Oil Patch.

The national balance of trade figures has been unacceptably high and continues to threaten American jobs and productivity. Our economy is operating at near capacity and still running a trade deficit, in part, because of the steady deindustrialization of the last 8 years.

In 8 years, our Nation has also become dangerously addicted to foreign capital. In 1987, 20 percent of the bonds sold by the U.S. Government were purchased by foreigners. The Federal Reserve must now choose between growth for our economy and an acceptable return for our foreign investors. American land and productive industrial assets are for sale on the cheap to foreign investors.

Unless we turn around our reckless economic policies, Americans will be tenants in their own land, working for foreign bosses. Foreign nations may soon dictate policy to the U.S. Government in exchange for the continued purchase of Government bonds to finance our budget and trade deficits.

Simply put, Mr. President, deficits put America's economic future and her economic independence at risk. In addition, rising interest expenses are dollars which could be spent on better schools, roads, bridges, or better left in Americans' pockets.

I do not pretend that a constitutional amendment to require a balanced Federal budget will magically solve our problems. It will not. What is needed is political leadership willing to be square with the American people, leadership which will ask the American people for their patriotic support for a fiscal plan of shared sacrifice.

As Governor of the State of Nebraska, I had to balance eight budgets in a row. It was tough. There were many negotiations and political compromises. Balancing a budget is hard work. Fortunately, I had the benefit of a State constitutional provision which required a balanced budget. Nebraskans knew then and know now the benefits of fiscal discipline and by and large supported the tough decisions I had to make as Governor of the great State of Nebraska.

Mr. President, it is time that the Federal Government follow Nebraska's good example.

Over the years I have authored and supported comprehensive budget proposals which would have balanced the Federal budget. Yes, these proposals were tough and certain groups may have been upset with individual provisions of these budget proposals; however, these alternative budget proposals illustrated that a fair program of shared sacrifice can be crafted and that deficits can be reduced. Rather than avoid the problem of a rising tide of red ink, as the Congress and the President have done for the last 8 years, it is time to face this very real "red" threat, and conquer it.

With the start of a new administration and a new Congress, there is the promise of a new emphasis on deficit reduction. The balanced budget constitutional amendment is one tool that can assist our efforts and restore fiscal discipline to the Federal budget. It will give the President and the Congress the backbone to make those tough decisions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the constitutional amendment which I propose be printed in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 22

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S.J. Res. 24. Joint resolution to designate the period commencing on May 1, 1989, and ending on May 7, 1989, as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL OLDER AMERICANS ABUSE PREVENTION WEEK

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution declaring May 1 to 7, 1989, as "National Older American Abuse Prevention Week." This is the third year I have introduced such legislation and I hope that my distinguished colleagues will join me once again in this important effort.

Mr. President, although many agencies and organizations serving our older Americans have made notable contributions in improving the lives of our senior population over the past few years—by revamping rules and regulations, pinpointing issues, disseminating information and increasing public awareness—abuse of the elderly is still on the increase and greatly misunderstood. Further, recognition of elder abuse as a social problem and the identification of abuse victims has been a difficult task.

Data generated to date clearly show that the public is just beginning to understand the problem. According to a 1987 report published by the American Medical Association, 1 in every 25 Americans age 65 or older—approximately 1.1 million—suffer from moderate or severe abuse. This represents an increase of 100,000 cases a year since 1981.

Mr. President, it is unfortunate that despite the increasing incidence of elder abuse, many people still do not believe that such abuse occurs. Further, the term "elder abuse" implies several descriptions ranging from a wide variety of behaviors, conditions, and circumstances. Because a formal definition has not been developed, elder abuse is potentially more dangerous than child abuse and requires immediate public attention. The most conservative estimate is that over 500,000 older Americans are victims of physical abuse. The American Public Welfare Association argues that the number of elder abuse cases should include psychological abuse and a variety of neglectful treatments. If we utilize what I agree is a more proper definition of the problem, the number of abused elder Americans approaches 2.5 million, or nearly 1 out of every 10 older Americans.

Mr. President, it is, indeed, appropriate that this national week of recognition of the elder abuse problem falls within the month of May as that month has traditionally been designaged "Older Americans Month." It is also important that the first week of May be designated "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week" in order to underscore the magnitude of this tragedy to those who have already contributed so much, and without which we would not enjoy the many blessings we now enjoy.

As I have previously stated, Members of Congress have an opportunity to assist the many individuals, organizations, and agencies that are striving to rid this great nation of our epidemic elder abuse problem and to assist the victims as well. We can help focus public attention on the goals and objectives of these agencies and improve the general welfare of our elders.

The declaration of May 1 to 7, 1989, as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week" is one way in which we in Congress can help increase public awareness of this national problem. There is help available in communities throughout the Nation, but we need to get that message out to the abused as well as the abuser. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to have the first week in May 1989, designated as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 24

Whereas each year an estimated 550,000 to 2.5 million elders are the victims of physical and emotional abuse, neglect, and denial of fundamental civil rights;

Whereas these elders represent every racial, religious and socio-economic class;

Whereas the suffering of these elders poses a threat to our families and to our society as a whole:

Whereas in most instances this neglect and abuse stems from the lack of information on intervention and prevention;

Whereas the health and well-being of our elders is, and must be, one of our Nation's highest priorities;

Whereas May, 1988, has traditionally been designated as "Older Americans Month", and provides the ideal opportunity for the people of the United States to become educated and aware of the welfare of the elderly; and

Whereas it is appropriate to focus the attention of the Nation upon the problem elderly abuse: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the period commencing on May 1, 1989, and ending on May 7, 1989, is designated as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such period with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. LEVIN, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S.J. Res. 25. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 7, 1989, through May 14, 1989, as "Jewish Heritage Week"; to the Committee on the Judicary.

JEWISH HERITAGE WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a joint resolution, designating the week of May 7 through May 14, 1989 as "Jewish Heritage Week". This resolution was introduced in the other body by the Honorable BENJAMIN GILMAN.

In our "melting pot" nation, each separate ethnic and religious group adds diversity and strength to the fabric of American culture. The American-Jewish population is certainly no exception—the Jewish contribution to American society is tremendous. Jews have been pioneers in industry, business, education, science, and in the entertainment field. It is important to commemorate the contributions to our American culture of those of Jewish heritage.

Jewish Heritage Week commemorates several events occurring on the Jewish calendar during the months of April, May, and June. One of these is Israel's Independence Day, celebrated on May 10, 1989—this year marks Israel's 41st anniversary. Since 1948, the United States and Israel have developed strong bonds of friendship and cooperation. The United States was the first nation to recognize the State of Israel and has consistently supported that nation. Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, is vital to our national security, it being our only reliable ally in the region.

The Holocaust Memorial Day, observed on May 2, marks another significant day on the calendar. On this day Jews and nonJews alike mourn the senseless and brutal murder of over 6 million innocent men, women, and children. It is important that we remember and try to understand this horrible occurrence, and vow never to let it happen again.

Equally important is the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, remembered on April 19. Though unsuccessful, this was an attempt to strike back at the Nazis. The men, women, and children who participated will always be remembered for their courage and bravery.

The holiday of Passover, beginning on the night of April 19 this year, celebrate Moses leading the Hebrew people out of bondage in Egypt to freedom in the Promised Land. Jerusalem Day, celebrated on June 2, marks the anniversary of the unification of Jerusalem after the 6-Day War.

Jewish Heritage Week will designate the week of May 7 as a special time to celebrate and observe the special events of these 3 months. These days will be marked throughout the United States with prayers, special services, discussions, seminars, and other programs. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this resolution be printed in the RECORD immediately following my statement. Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 25

Whereas May 10, 1989 marks the forty-first anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel;

Whereas the months of April, May and June contain events of major significance in the Jewish calendar—Passover, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Holocaust Memorial Day, and Jerusalem Day.

Whereas the Congress recognizes that an understanding of the heritage of all American ethnic groups contributes to the unity of our country; and

Whereas intergroup understanding can be further fostered through an appreciation of the culture, history and traditions of the Jewish community and the contributions of Jews to our country and society; Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 7, 1989 through May 14, 1989, is designated as "Jewish Heritage Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States, State and local government agencies, and interested organizations to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies, activities and programs.●

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S.J. Res. 27. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution altering Federal budget procedures; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT TO ALTER FEDERAL BUDGET PROCEDURES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as one steps out of the Capital building, goes down the mall past the Smithsonian buildings, past the Washington Monument, to the Lincoln Memorial, and then follows the Potomac River downstream, one will come to the Jefferson Memorial. This building, containing the standing figure of Jefferson gazing over the Tidal Basin and overlooking the city of Washington, stands as a tribute to this remarkable man. At the age of 33, this man was called to draft our Declaration of Independence to assert our autonomy from England. His stature among our Founding Fathers is immense, and his role as an architect for our Nation's form of government is unsurpassed.

As one stands inside Jefferson Memorial, some of his most famous words are etched into the white Georgia marble. These words ring out with truth and knowledge, and are as appropriate today as when they were first uttered. Echoing within that domed chamber are these words:

I am not an advocate for frequent changes in laws and constitutions, but laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths discovered and manners and opinions change, with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also to keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their barbarous ancestors.

These words speak of change—now is the time for change.

Every Congress since I have been elected as a U.S. Senator, I have introduced legislation proposing a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget. Today I rise to introduce a Senate Joint Resolution, which is a measure to require the Federal Government to achieve and maintain a balanced budget. In the past, I have dedicated myself to work with my colleagues to curb Federal spending. That dedication has not changed, and I recognize that in the coming months and years we must work with President Bush to make hard decisions concerning the Federal budget. However, the fiscal irresponsibility demonstrated in the past 25 years has convinced me that the only way to achieve and maintain a balanced Federal budget is by an amendment to the Constitution.

Allow me to illustrate, with a harsh taste of reality, some of our critical problems. Today, we are not only a debtor nation, we are world's largest debtor nation. The Office of Management and Budget has noted that the gross Federal debt is expected to reach $2,818.2 billion by the end of the fiscal year 1989. For fiscal year 1988 the gross interest on the debt was $214.2 billion and the net interest for the same year was $151.7 billion. This gross interest is the total interest obligation of the United States, while the net interest is the figure that represents the interest owed on the publically held debt. Further, the Congressional Budget Office expects the net interest to make up approximately 14.5 percent of the total spending for fiscal year 1989.

Facts and figures can be confusing, so let me try to peel off some of the rhetoric and reveal what this interest spending means. We are forced to spend billions of dollars just to maintain the deficit that we have now. Further, the deeper our Nation goes into debt, the more we will have to spend every year to maintain that debt. To put all these payments in perspective, the net interest payments are currently larger than any outlay in the Federal budget except for defense spending and health and human services spending. Net interest payment outlays are aproximately three times the anticipated spending for the Department of Agriculture; approximately five to seven times the expected spending for the Departments of Education, Housing and Urban Development, Labor, Transportation, and the Veterans' Administration. Further, this amount is almost 15 times more than NASA will spend in fiscal year 1989, and is 25 to 30 times more than either the Justice Department or the Interior Department will spend in fiscal year 1989. These figures are not only astonishing—they are deplorable.

For much of our Nation's history, a balanced Federal budget was the status quo and part of our "unwritten constitution." For our first 100 years, this Republic carried a surplus budget, but in the last 25 years this Nation's spending has gone out of control.

We have made efforts to bring the budget under control. During my tenure in office I have supported an advocated efforts which have come close to moving a balanced budget amendment through Congress. During the 97th Congress this measure was passed in the Senate, but failed to gain passage in the House. In the 99th Congress, after extensive debate, passage of a balanced budget amendment by the Senate failed by one vote. However, today we begin a new Congress, the 101st Congress, and again I call on my colleagues to support this crucial initiative and support a balanced budget amendment.

I cannot promise that the amendment I am offering today is a panacea for all the economic troubles of our Nation. However, it will help to cure many of these problems. The amendment that I am offering is not perfect. There will and should be changes in the language, but every discussion must have a starting point. I believe that my amendment is a good beginning to the final passage of a balanced budget amendment.

This amendment contains five brief but critical provisions. Section 1 of the amendment requires a three-fifths vote of each House of Congress before the Federal Government can engage in deficit spending. This requirement establishes the norm that spending will not exceed receipts in any fiscal year. If the Government is going to spend money, it should have the money on hand to pay its bills. Under this section, Congress would be required to adopt an initial statement in each fiscal year in which outlays do not exceed receipts.

Section 2 of the amendment addresses the enforcement issue. It provides that there will be no increases in the public debt to fund any excess of outlays over receipts, unless Congress shall by law and by vote of three-fifths of the whole number of each House of Congress provide for such an increase.

Section 3 requires a majority vote of the whole number of each House of Congress any time Congress votes to increase revenues. This holds public officials responsible, and puts elected officials on record for any tax increase which may be necessary to support Federal spending.

Section 4 provides for the submission by the President of a balanced budget to Congress; or if the President cannot submit a balanced budget, this section requires that the President submit a statement explaining why the budget is unbalanced.

My greatest concern with past constitutional amendments to balance the budget has been the restrictive nature of the provisions allowing for waiver of the requirements of a balanced budget if a declared war is in effect. Although this exception is necessary, I believe that it does not go far enough. The United States has engaged in only five declared wars, yet the United States has engaged in hostilities abroad which required no less commitment of human lives or American resources than declared wars. In fact, our Nation has been involved in approximately 200 instances in which the United States has used military forces abroad in situations of conflict. Not all of these would move Congress to seek a waiver of the requirement of a balanced budget, but Congress should have the constitutional flexibility to provide for our Nation's security.

Section 5 automatically waives the provisions for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect. My amendment further allows Congress to waive the requirement of a balanced budget if the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious threat to national security, which is declared by a joint resolution adopted by a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress and such joint resolution must be signed by the President and become law.

Mr. President, the future of our Nation's economy is not a partisan issue. Further, the problem of deficit spending cannot be blamed on one branch of government or one political party. Similarly, just as everyone must share part of the blame for our economic ills, everyone must be united in acting to attack the growing problem of deficit spending. I recognize that a balanced budget amendment will not cure our economic problems overnight, but it will act to change the course of our future and lead to responsible fiscal management by our national government. This issue is not new and this issue is not flashy, but it is critically important to the future economic strength of this Nation.

In bringing my remarks to a conclusion, I am again reminded of a statement by Thomas Jefferson. In 1789, when the Constitution was adopted, Jefferson warned, "the public debt is the greatest of dangers to be feared by a republican government." Somewhere we have lost sight of our forefathers' admonitions.

Leadership and fiscal responsibility are the duties that we carry as elected Members of Congress. Our forefathers who addressed this Chamber had the integrity and wisdom to protect our future. Our duty to future generations should be no less. By passage of a balanced budget amendment we can look to our children and grandchildren and say that in at least some small way we made the effort to protect their dreams of a brighter tomorrow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the amendment be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 27

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Prior to each fiscal year, the Congress shall adopt a statement of receipts and outlays for that year in which total outlays are not greater than total receipts. The Congress may amend such statement provided revised outlays are not greater than revised receipts. Whenever three-fifths of the whole number of each House of the Congress shall deem it necessary, Congress in such statement may provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts by a vote directed solely to that subject. The Congress and the President shall ensure that actual outlays do not exceed the outlays set forth in such statement.

"SECTION 2. The public debt of the United States shall not be increased to fund any excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of each House of Congress shall provide, by law, for such an increase.

"SECTION 3. Any bill to increase revenue shall become law only if approved by a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress by rollcall vote.

"SECTION 4. Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall submit a proposed budget to Congress for that fiscal year in which total outlays are no greater than total receipts. The President may also recommend an alternative budget in which total outlays exceed total receipts, which shall be accompanied by a detailed explanation of the need for such excess."

"SECTION 5. The provisions of this article are automatically waived for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

"The provisions of this article may be waived for any fiscal year in which the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to national security and is so declared by a joint resolution, adopted by a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress, which becomes law. Afterwards any waiver adopted shall be by a joint resolution of like requirements.

"SECTION 6. This article shall take effect for the fiscal year 1992 or for the third fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.".

By Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. PELL):

S.J. Res. 28. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States limiting Federal taxation of State and local obligations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO STATE BONDS

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I am once again introducing a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn last year's unfortunate Supreme Court decision in South Carolina versus Baker. In that decision the Supreme Court said that there was nothing in the Constitution that protected State and local bonds from Federal taxation. My fear is that our current budget problems will tempt Congress to reach for State bond revenues now declared vulnerable by the Supreme Court.

Caught in the exigencies of decreasing the Federal budget deficit, Congress may well overlook the value of States in our own Federal system. In my view, States are so important to the American people that if they did not today exist, their creation would be my top priority. The function of States is to be responsible and accountable for a part of government so that the electorate can better control its political fate. If the work of government is allocated to multiple and distinct responsible parties—National, State, and local, the people have greater power. They have more control over their own lives. They have more choice. They have more freedom.

Likewise, as more and more functions of government become federalized, people become disempowered. And after decade of federalizing State and local functions, the people's freedom is declining and their apathy is growing.

But, make no mistake about my proposal. It does not seek to roll back our long history of federalizing State and local functions. It is designed, as best as could be, to freeze the status quo, to stop the Federal drain on State and local revenues, to halt the trend.

In our Federal system, States cannot be sovereign, States cannot be States unless they have their own protected source of revenue. In the marketplace any tax placed on State or local obligations by the Federal Government is not borne by the bondholder but is passed back to the issuer.

Recognizing this fact, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 377 in the 100th Congress. The proposed constitutional amendment consisted of one simple sentence: The United States shall not have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes derived from the obligations of the several States issued for a public purpose.

Since that introduction on September 14, 1988, I have had the good fortune to receive the advice and counsel of various State officials and bond lawyers. Consequently, today I am introducing a revised and expanded version of my proposal. It contains two sections: The first declares what obligation may not be taxed; the second makes absolutely clear that Congress may exempt from taxation any "other obligations" on any basis available under the constitution today.

The first section is expanded in order to clarify certain points. Let me state them as succinctly as possible. First, while it is still necessary that an obligation, to qualify for constitutional protection, be issued for a public purpose, it is additionally required that the State or local revenues be raised either: First, for governmental undertakings and operations; or second, to finance property owned and operated by governmental entities. This "operations" or "property" test is intended to reduce ambiguity and to underscore that it is essential governmental functions that are protected.

Second, when I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 377 last year, I said on this floor that what is protected is "the income interest of the bondholder * * * and not * * * any capital gain the bondholder may realize upon the sale to another bondholder." This construction is now made explicit; the proposal protects only "income representing interest * * *." Thus capital gain income is not protected.

Third, the language now makes explicit that local government bonds may qualify for protection, a fact that was constitutionally implicit in my earlier draft. As I then said on the floor, "While the language of my amendment includes no reference to any political subdivisions of the States, this is only customary constitutional drafting. The protection accorded to a State would flow to any of the State's subdivisions acting under State law." However, in view of the fact that political subdivisions of the States issue so many bonds and since the guidelines on constitutional drafting are not always not always that clear, it was thought advisable to expressly refer to political subdivisions in the text. No change in meaning is intended. Nor is there any intention to create any Federal source of authority for the issuance of tax-exempt bonds by local governments. There is no intention to alter in any way the relationship between a State and its political subdivisions.

Fourth, the phrase, "obligations issued by" is expanded to "obligations issued by or on behalf of" to overcome any questions that the Treasury Department might raise concerning whether an entity created under State or local law which issues bonds is actually obligating the State or local government.

Mr. President, I believe these changes enhance my proposal. It is important that we get to work soon on preserving this modicum of federalism.

I am very pleased to have join me as original cosponsors the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, the Senator, from Rhode Island, Mr. PELL, and the Senator from Idaho, Mr. SYMMS. The Senator from South Carolina represents the State that lost the Supreme Court decision we seek to overturn. As the former chairman and now ranking Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction over constitutional amendments, it is particularly fortunate to have his support in this important cause.

Finally, I would like to thank the many State and local officials who have taken their time to discuss this issue with me. Also I would like to thank the many State and local organizations who have expressed great interest in this cause. Particularly, I am pleased to have received the advice and wise counsel of the National Association of State Treasurers. We are all pleased to have their support for the proposed constitutional amendment introduced today.

Thank you, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my joint resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. SHELBY:

S.J. Res. 29. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which requires—except during time of war and subject to suspension by the Congress—that the total amount of money expended by the United States during any fiscal year not exceed the amount of certain revenue received by the United States during such fiscal year and not exceed 20 per centum of the gross national product of the United States during the previous calendar year; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO A BALANCED BUDGET

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce, Senate Joint Resolution 29, a resolution which proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to require—except during time of war and subject to suspension by the Congress—that the total amount of money expended by the United States during any fiscal year not exceed the amount of revenues received by the United States during such fiscal year and not exceed 20 per centum of the gross national product of the United States during the previous calendar years. This measure is identical to legislation that I introduced while serving four terms as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives.

This resolution is unique in that it combines the need for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget with a cap on overall spending. By making sure that congressional budget outlays do not exceed 20 percent of the previous calendar year's gross national product, we restrain ourselves from raising spending levels just because the country did well economically.

I take this action because I believe that until our still outrageously high deficits are reduced, long-term economic growth will be at the mercy of deficit-induced high interest rates and the subsequent onset of rising inflation. Therefore, it is imperative that Congress devise a more palatable budget, one which clamps down on wasteful spending while smoothing the way for the restoration of fiscal sanity to our financial system.

It is time for Congress to stop looking at the short-term benefits of particular programs and start looking at the long-term effects our policies will have on our children and our children's children down the road.

In order to accomplish this task we will need the assistance of all segments of society: the President; Congress; business, both large and small; our Federal agencies, State legislatures; and the whole spectrum of special interests. However, it must be Congress that takes the leadership role.

I supported the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, otherwise known as the Gramm-

Rudman-Hollings amendment, which required Congress to balance the budget by 1991. Subsequently, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Control Reaffirmation Act of 1987 amended the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation extending the original 1991 target date for balancing the budget to 1993.

The deficit goal for fiscal 1988 was changed from $131 billion to $144 billion. Subsequent deficit goals are $136 billion in fiscal 1989, $100 billion in fiscal 1990, $64 billion in fiscal 1991, $28 billion in fiscal 1992 and zero in fiscal 1993.

The revised Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation also raised the Federal debt ceiling from $2.1 trillion to $2.8 trillion. I objected to the raising of the debt ceiling. The sky is not the limit. At some point, Congress must say no. We cannot continue to raise the debt limit and delay indefinitely making the difficult but necessary choices on how to balance the Federal budget.

I believe that the magnitude of the problem warrants stronger action. Congress is finding it more and more difficult to reach the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets. We also risk the danger of falling back into the trap of projecting deficits far short of actual amounts and then trying to figure out ways to pay for them.

For example, in fiscal year 1986, the Office of Management and Budget [OMB] projected a deficit of $172 billion. The actual deficit turned out to be $221 billion. In fiscal year 1987, the projection was $143 billion, the actual figure was $150 billion. This has continued through fiscal year 1988 when the administration projected a deficit of $107 billion whereas we really spent $155 billion. Therefore, a responsible Federal policy demands that a cap be placed on spending and a constitutional requirement is the only mechanism that will work.

During the past 8 years, the Federal debt has almost tripled from $1 trillion in 1981 to $2.8 trillion in 1989. If we continue at the present rate, we could be looking at a Federal debt of $4 trillion by 1994. Until we realistically come to grips with this issue, the budget deficit will surely continue to grow.

There are those who believe that our $2.8 trillion national debt is a nonissue, that the American people are not concerned about its effect on the economy or in their everyday lives.

There are those who might argue that reducing the deficit or eliminating it all together would bring on a recession. I believe the effect would be just the opposite. These huge deficits, piled up year after year, have brought about much of this country's economic problems, particularly the trade deficit, which reached $155 billion last year, and have also brought about low capital investment. Eliminating deficits would certainly aid in the reversal of our trade problems and free up capital for productive private investment.

Mr. President, for too long we have operated under a tax-and-spend philosophy—steadily increasing the role of Government in our lives while assessing increasingly onerous taxes on our taxpayers. Therefore, it is important that Congress eliminate wasteful spending across the board.

With a definite ceiling on how much money the Federal Government can spend, the President and Congress will be forced to look more carefully at each expenditure and at each revenue-raising attempt. This will be a painful process, but one that I feel is mandated by the crucial nature of the problem and something that is far preferable to placing the burden of debt on future generations of Americans.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

By Mr. GRAMM:

S.J. Res. 30. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to Federal budget procedures; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, with the introduction of this resolution, I again offer this great body the opportunity to vote on the No. 1 problem in America, and that problem is deficit spending. I am introducing a bill that is essentially the balanced budget constitutional amendment adopted by the Senate in 1982. It has been modified slightly but only to reflect the course we have laid out in the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, along with the Reaffirmation Act of 1987. It would require the President to submit a balanced budget to Congress as well as forcing Congress to enact balanced budgets. Also, it would make the balanced budget requirement take effect in 1993 in accordance with our stated deficit reduction goals.

This is an important constitutional issue and worthy of our immediate attention. This amendment would correct a flaw in our Constitution first identified by Thomas Jefferson. When Jefferson returned from Paris where he had been minister to France during the writing of the Constitution, he studied the document and concluded: "If I could change one thing about it, I would change the ability or limit the ability of the Federal Government to borrow money."

Today we still wrestle with a flaw recognized more than two centuries ago. The balanced budget amendment would correct this dangerous flaw by limiting the power of the Federal Government to spend money it doesn't have. A few years ago, I co-authored a bill with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Senator HOLLINGS, and the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, Senator RUDMAN, to force deficit reductions. I believe it has helped us progress toward a balanced budget.

But the problem with it is this: What Congress can make, Congress can unmake. Only by making the balanced budget a constitutional requirement can we force Congress to live up to its promise. With adoption of this resolution, I believe we can permanently change the Federal Government's fiscal policy for the better.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 30

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Prior to each fiscal year, Congress shall adopt a statement of receipts and outlays for such fiscal year in which total outlays are not greater than total receipts. Congress may amend such statement provided revised outlays are not greater than revised receipts. Congress may provide in such statement for a specific excess of outlays over receipts by a vote directed solely to that subject in which three-fifths of the whole number of each House agree to such excess. The Congress and the President shall ensure that actual outlays do not exceed the outlays set forth in such statement.

"SECTION 2. Total receipts for any fiscal year set forth in the statement adapted pursuant to the first section of this article shall not increase by a rate greater than the rate of increase in national income in the year or years ending not less than six months before such fiscal year, unless a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress shall have passed a bill directed solely to approving specific additional receipts and such bill has become law.

"SECTION 3. Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to Congress a proposed statement of receipts and outlays for such fiscal year consistent with the provisions of this article.

"SECTION 4. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

By Mr. DIXON:

S.J. Res. 31. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution authorizing the President to disapprove or reduce an item of appropriations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LINE-ITEM VETO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise today to reintroduce a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment authorizing the President to disapprove or reduce individual items of appropriations, subject to a majority vote override. I am joined in this effort by my warm friend and distinguished colleague, Senator PAUL SIMON.

I am also reintroducing legislation to expand the President's rescission authority because action on the constitutional amendment will necessarily take a substantial period of time, and we need the benefits to be garnered from the item veto now.

I do not propose this constitutional amendment and expanded rescission authority lightly, but I am convinced we need fundamental changes in our budgeting procedures if we are ever to restore fiscal discipline to the Federal Government. Our looming deficit cuts into our ability to deal with the many other problems facing the Nation. Until we significantly reduce the deficit, we will not be able to fully fund many other vital domestic programs. The budget deficit was $220 billion in fiscal 1986, $150 billion in fiscal year 1987. Unfortunately, the reduction is not due to fundamental budget reform, however, but rather to budgetary "blue smoke and mirrors." Further, a $150 billion deficit is still $6 billion over the fiscal year 1987 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target of $144 billion, and the prospects for meeting future Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets, despite their upward adjustments, and balancing the budget by 1991 are questionable at best. Let us not forget a number of costly initiatives have been discussed by President Bush. Where does the money come for those initiatives when the deficit continues to eat away at our ability to meet the needs of the country. Budgetary legerdemain will not solve our ongoing fiscal crisis; fundamental reform of our budget processes is required if Federal deficits are to be controlled over the long run.

Solving our budget problems will require strong action in a number of areas. I am convinced that adding an item veto provision to our Constitution is probably the single most important action we could take if we really want to end the deficit nightmare.

The item veto has a long and distinguished history. It first appeared in the Confederate Constitution. In the years since the Civil War it has been included in the constitutions of 43 of the 50 States. The States gave their Governors this authority because it was needed, because it strengthens their budget processes, and because it works. No State that has adopted the item veto has ever repealed it.

While the idea has demonstrated its merit at the State level, however, it has never seriously been considered at the Federal level. Numerous item veto proposals have been introduced in Congress since the first one in 1876. At least seven different Presidents have requested item veto authority. But none of these proposals or requests has ever been sent to the States or been acted on by either the House or the Senate.

Mr. President, it is long past time to change that situation, and act on an item veto provision that helps restore the President's veto power. I say restore because the truth is that the Presidential veto is now a much weaker weapon than it once was.

Under our Constitution, a President can only veto an entire bill. He or she cannot veto individual items of spending within the bill—the veto is an all or nothing proposition. When our Constitution was written, that was a reasonable and workable balance of powers between the legislative and executive branches. Government was smaller and simpler. Over the past two centuries, though, Congress has tipped the balance in its favor and substantially eroded the President's veto power. The growth in Government, together with the increasing use of omnibus legislation, now make it significantly more difficult for a President to play the role envisioned by the Nation's founders.

At times, a President has the choice of either shutting down the Government, or signing into law billions of dollars of spending which he or she does not support. In 1987, you will recall, all Government spending was included in a single omnibus bill instead of the 13 annual appropriation bills that Congress usually acts on to exercise its control over Government spending.

Congress did pass each appropriation bill on its own in 1988, rather than in one lump sum, but the practice of attaching controversial items to "must" bills in an effort to make it more difficult for a President to use his veto power was just as evident. Logrolling, and packaging good and bad programs into a single appropriations bill, have become a way of life.

These practices are near and dear to the hearts of many legislators, but they work to undermine our ability to budget in a fiscally sound and responsible manner. They are clearly wasteful, extravagant, and destructive.

Congress will never resolve the deficit problems, Mr. President, if it continues this "business as usual" approach. Congress must surrender some of the prerogatives it has accumulated over the years, and allow at least a partial restoration of the President's veto power.

Many Members, as well as those who benefit from the current way of doing things, may not want to surrender all the power they have gained. To ensure that the proper balance of powers between the legislative and executive branches of Government is maintained—to ensure no possibility of the creation of an imperial Presidency—I am proposing only a partial restoration, giving the President item veto authority, but allowing Congress to override it by a simple constitutional majority.

Under my proposal, a President would have to choose: either veto an entire bill, forcing Congress to attempt to override by two-thirds vote, or use the item veto, recognizing that it would be easier for Congress to override.

Stated another way, it simply allows a President to put the Congress on record, to see whether there is in fact majority support for certain individual items of spending in an omnibus bill. As we all know too well, most Members of Congress have never seen and do not know about many of the literally thousands of individual items in the hundreds of pages of appropriations bills enacted every year. We rely on staff, and the knowledge, character, and ability of the Senators and Representatives that are the subcommittee chairmen and ranking members that handle the bills. Yet all these items are presumed to have majority support because they were included in a major bill that majorities in both the House and the Senate supported.

If a President opposes an item, why shouldn't he or she have the right to ask the Congress to go on record, and to determine whether the majority that is presumed to exist actually exists? In the early days of our Republic, Presidents often effectively had that right because bills were narrower and did not deal with more than one subject. We have now reached the point, however, where a single appropriations bill contains over $558 billion in spending authority, a practice which I believe usurps the President's constitutionally mandated role in the legislative process.

Majority override means that a President could not overturn strong congressional support for a single item through use of the item veto and the support of "one-third plus one" in either the House or the Senate. Only the veto of an entire bill would take a two-thirds vote to override. An item veto would be sustained if the President commanded majority support, and would be overturned if the item had majority backing.

Mr. President, the Line-Item Recission Act is based on similar principles. I am introducing this proposal reluctantly because I believe a constitutional amendment is the better way to proceed. Further, some of the past rescission proposals would have given the President unilateral rescission authority, thus effectively giving a President two bites at the same apple. Under these proposals a President could sign a bill and rescind various items of spending. Congress would have to effectively act on a new bill repassing the items to overturn the rescission, and this action would be subject to Presidential veto, requiring a two-thirds vote to override.

My proposal is merely a small expansion of authority already available to Presidents under the Budget Act. It does not give a President unilateral rescission authority. It is designed to make the rescission mechanism as close to a majority override line-item veto constitutional provision as is possible through statutory means while not violating constitutional principles. It can be put into effect far more quickly than a constitutional change, and would provide at least part of the benefits of the constitutional amendment.

The legislation permits a President to defer items of spending contained in an appropriations bill for 60 days while Congress considers rescission resolutions under expedited procedures. Each rescission resolution would cover a single item and would have to be voted on separately, as the veto of an individual item would be.

Both Houses of Congress would have to vote on the resolution or resolutions within 60 days of their transmittal to Congress by a President. If the President had majority support the resolution would pass and the item would be rescinded. If the item had majority support, the spending would go forward without being subject to further Presidental veto.

The rescission resolutions would not be amendable since veto messages are not amendable, and the expedited procedures would guarantee a vote on the resolutions. This provision, of course, is different from the way a veto message is considered. There is no guarantee that a veto message will be voted on at all. However, a veto is effective unless overturned by both Houses of Congress while a rescission is effective only when approved in both Houses. The combination of the limited deferral authority, and the expedited procedures guaranteeing a vote, is necessary to ensure that Congress faces the issues raised by a President's opposition to particular items.

The item veto constitutional amendment is not a cure-all for the budget problems we are facing, Mr. President. Dealing with the deficit will require action in every area of the budget, action that will be difficult and distasteful. However, this proposal can and will make a real difference. If a Federal item veto with majority override works as well at the Federal level as it does in my own State of Illinois, it could save $27 billion a year or more.

I urge the Senate to consider this proposal very carefully. I am convinced that the result of this fair and reasonable examination will be early submission of the constitutional amendment to the States for ratification. I look forward to working with my colleagues toward these objectives. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 32. Joint resolution to designate February 2, 1989, as "National Women and Girls in Sports Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL WOMEN AND GIRLS IN SPORTS DAY

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today in order to introduce a joint resolution designating February 2, 1989, as "National Women and Girls in Sports Day."

While the history of women in sports is rich and long, too often we have ignored the contributions female athletes have made to our society.

Organized physical activity for young women has been shown to contribute to their healthy development. A girl who regularly participates in an organized sporting activity is more likely to develop a strong sense of self-esteem and a better physical self-image than one who misses this important opportunity.

In last year's Olympic games, the performances of such female athletes as Jackie-Joyner Kersee, Florence Griffith-Joyner, Bonnie Blair, Janet Evans, and the entire U.S. Women's Basketball Team demonstrated just how high a standard women can achieve when they are given the proper access to sporting equipment and top level coaching. The goals which they set and achieved for themselves are an example for us all.

Despite recent advances, however, athletic opportunities for male students at the collegiate and high school levels still far exceed those for female students. It is time to recognize that these inequities exist, while highlighting how far women have come in their athletic achievements.

I would like to thank those Senators who have joined as original cosponsors of this year's effort, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 32

Whereas women's athletics is one of the most effective avenues available through which women of America may develop self-discipline, initiative, confidence, and leadership skills;

Whereas support and fitness activity contributes to emotional and physical well-being and women need strong bodies as well as strong minds;

Whereas the history of women in sports is rich and long, but there has been little national recognition of the significance of women's athletic achievements;

Whereas the number of women in leadership positions of coaches, officials, and administrators has declined drastically over the last decade and there is a need to restore women to these positions to ensure a fair representation of women's abilities and to provide role models for young female athletes;

Whereas the bonds built between women through athletics help to break down the social barriers of racism and prejudice;

Whereas the communication and cooperation skills learned through athletic experience play a key role in the athlete's contributions at home, at work, and to society;

Whereas women's athletics has produced such winners as Flo Hyman, whose spirit, talent, and accomplishments distinguished her above others and exhibited for all of us the true meaning of fairness, determination, and team play;

Whereas parents feel that sports are equally important for boys and girls and that sports and fitness activities provide important benefits to girls who participate;

Whereas early motor-skill training and enjoyable experiences of physical activity strongly influence life-long habits of physical fitness;

Whereas the performances of such female athletes as Jackie Joyner-Kersee, Florence Griffith Joyner, Bonnie Blair, Janet Evans, the U.S. Women's Basketball Team and many others in the 1988 Olympic Games were a source of inspiration and pride to all of us;

Whereas the athletic opportunities for male students at the collegiate and high school level remain significantly greater than those for female students; and

Whereas the number of funded research projects focusing on the specific needs of women athletes is limited and the information provided by these projects is imperative to the health and performance of future women athletes: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That February 2, 1989, is hereby designated as "National Women and Girls in Sports Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon local and State jurisdictions, appropriate Federal agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

S.J. Res. 34. Joint resolution designating the week of April 16, 1989, through April 22, 1989, as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MINORITY CANCER AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, we all know about the devastating toll that the deadly disease of cancer annually takes from our Nation. But many are not aware of the fact that cancer has a disproportionately higher impact on minorities and the economically disadvantaged.

To increase public awareness of this, today I am introducing a joint reoslution that will designate the third week in April as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week." I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Studies have shown that the overall incidence of cancer among blacks and Hispanics is significantly higher as compared to the population in general. Statistics cited in a recent edition of the Cancer Bulletin published by the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center of the University of Texas reveal that more black American males have died from lung cancer over the past 2 years than were killed during the Vietnam War. Cervical cancer is found in Hispanic women twice as often as it is found in white women. And while the cancer survival rate for the Nation as a whole is improving steadily, it has actually dropped among blacks and Hispanics.

These facts demonstrate the need for our heatlh professionals and medical research community to study the characteristics of our minority and economically disadvantaged populations and develop new approaches to dealing with their unique cancer problems.

One way that Congress can help the medical community in dealing with the minority cancer problem is by promoting public awareness of the cancer crisis in the minority and economically disadvantaged community. In the 100th Congress, Congressman DYMALLY and I were successful in securing passage of a joint resolution designating the third week in April, 1987 as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week." We did this in connection with the First Biennial Symposium on Minorities, the Economically Disadvantaged and Cancer held at the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center.

The medical community strongly believes that passage of our resolution in the 100th Congress contributed greatly to a public awareness campaign that successfully highlighted the problems cancer poses for the minority community. As the Second Biennial Symposium approaches, I am again working in coordination with Congressman DYMALLY to designate the third week in April as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week."

Improving public awareness of the problems relating to cancer among the minority community in our Nation is a worthy endeavor. If we can mount a successful effort against cancer in the minority community, one of cancer's strongholds, a crucial battle in our overall war against cancer will be won. Passage of this joint resolution will represent a small but important step in that effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 34

Whereas the month of April each year is designated as National Cancer Month for the purpose of promoting increased awareness of the causes, types, and treatments of cancer;

Whereas the National Cancer Institute has recognized that significant differences exist in the incidence of cancer and survival rates for cancer patients between minority and economically disadvantaged communities in the United States and the population in general;

Whereas increased awareness of the causes of cancer and available treatments will help reduce cancer rates among minorities and the economically disadvantaged through preventive measures and will improve survival rates for cancer patients through early diagnosis;

Whereas a comprehensive national approach is needed to increase awareness about cancer among minorities and economically disadvantaged persons, and to encourage health care professionals, researchers, and policy makers to develop solutions to the cancer-related problems unique to these communities; and

Whereas focusing public attention on cancer in minority and economically disadvantaged communities during one week so designated will have a positive impact on preventive health care and treatment in these communities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 16, 1989, through April 22, 1989, is designated as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States and all Federal, State, and local government officials to observe the week with appropriate programs and activities.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 5—AUTHORIZING USE OF THE CAPITOL ROTUNDA FOR INAUGURATION OF DISPLAY OF THE POW/MIA FLAG

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. MITCHELL) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 5

Whereas America can never forget the sacrifices of our brave servicemen still missing in action, nor the heroic suffering of our prisoners of war;

Whereas the families of Americans missing in Southeast Asia, having suffered greatly themselves, joined together in 1970 as the National League of Families to facilitate and promote the fullest possible accounting for POW/MIA's;

Whereas the official National League of Families POW/MIA flag symbolizes the nationwide recognition that is justly deserved by the missing and unaccounted for servicemen of all armed conflicts; and

Whereas the POW/MIA flag is an effective means of further raising public consciousness on this key American issue: Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the rotunda of the Capitol may be used on Thursday, March 9, 1989, at 3 p.m., for ceremonies to observe the unveiling of the National League of Families POW/MIA flag which shall be displayed in the Capitol Rotunda until a satisfactory accounting of all America's POW/MIA's has taken place. the POW/MIA flag so displayed shall be in such size and at such place as the Architect of the Capitol, the Speaker and the Minority Leader of the United States House of Representatives, and the Majority and Minority Leaders of the United States Senate shall designate.

SEC. 2. The Architect of the Capitol may prescribe conditions for physical preparations with respect to the use of the rotunda authorized by the first section.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 6—RELATIVE TO THE ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE PROGRAM

Mr. ROCKEFELLER (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. SIMON, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. BURNS, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KERRY, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. EXON, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. REID, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. ROBB, Mr. BRYAN,

Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. KERREY, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. GARN, Mr. COHEN, and Mr. MURKOWSKI) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. CON. RES. 6

Whereas in 1978, in response to airline deregulation, Congress enacted the Essential Air Service program for the purpose of ensuring air service to rural communities for a ten-year period;

Whereas about 150 small and rural communities have received subsidies under the Essential Air Service program at a cost to the Federal Government of less than $30,000,000;

Whereas for these 150 rural communities, air service is their lifeline to the rest of the country, both economically and socially;

Whereas in 1987 Congress reaffirmed its strong commitment to guaranteeing air service to rural communities by enacting a ten-year extension and expansion of the Essential Air Service program;

Whereas the fiscal year 1989 appropriations for the Essential Air Service program are $6,600,000 less than the projected amount needed to support 1988 services and about $19,000,000 less than the full annual amount needed to support the program at levels authorized by the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of Transportation should refrain from adopting regulations to implement Essential Air Service reductions for 1989 and from taking any other action that would result in a reduction in Essential Air Service subsidies, until Congress has had the opportunity to appropriate supplemental funding for the Essential Air Service program for fiscal year 1989.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today is the first working legislative day and I am very pleased to introduce, along with 34 of my distinguished colleagues, including my very distinguished senior colleague, Senator BYRD, a resolution that seeks to ensure that the life of the Essential Air Service program will continue.

A lot of my colleagues are going to be speaking on this subject this afternoon because they feel very strongly about it.

In December, while most of us were at home for the holiday, the Department of Transportation decided to surprise us with an early Christmas present. DOT quietly issued a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking which presented four alternative ways to cut air service subsidies to dozens of communities, setting January 30 as the fast track date for final rulemaking. DOT said in its rulemaking that the proposed cuts were in response to a $6.6 million shortfall in the EAS appropriations for fiscal year 1989.

Last week the Department of Transportation wrote a letter to the senior Senator from my State, Senator BYRD, saying that DOT would delay action on this rule due to the public outcry which it has provoked all across this country. In the letter DOT indicates that they will postpone issuing the final rule for no more than 60 days, which takes us only to mid-March.

I welcome DOT's delay in issuing this rule. However, DOT did not withdraw the rule. It was merely delayed. And Congress is not left with much time to act.

My resolution simply urges the Secretary of Transportation—and I am referring to Secretary Burnley and Secretary-designate Skinner—to give Congress the necessary time to find a way to correct this problem. Congress should be given the chance to work out a solution with the Department of Transportation.

Mr. President, in 1978, Congress deregulated the airline industry. Had I been there at that time, I would not have voted for that bill. However, it passed. For many Americans, I have to say, deregulation has been terrific. Americans, particularly those who live in our large cities like New York, Houston, Atlanta who could not afford to fly in the past, can now afford to fly everywhere. The number of Americans who fly, in fact, has multiplied substantially since the time of deregulation, and I am happy about that.

However, in 1978, when Congress was debating the impact of airline deregulation, they recognized that the airlines who were no longer compelled to serve smaller communities would, in fact, not do so. Congress realized that they would pull out and that they would head for the bigger cities, which is precisely what has happened.

I can remember in Charleston, WV, at the time, we had American, Eastern, and United Airlines. Within a month or two of the passage of that airline deregulation, they were gone from our State. Consequently, the Congress, understanding that this might happen, created something called an Essential Air Service Program. The purpose of this program was to ensure that rural America continued to receive air service.

Last year, Mr. President, the Congress strongly reaffirmed our support for the Essential Air Service Program by enacting a 10-year extension of this program. Air deregulation, however, even with the cushion provided by the Essential Air Service Program, has been very painful to rural America. Make no mistake about that. For my State of West Virginia, and I am sure for most of rural America, deregulation has meant fewer flights, skyrocketing costs, greater inconvenience and, frankly, lower quality air service.

For example, since 1978, all seven essential air service points in the State of West Virginia have changed ownership hands at least once. These changeovers cause uncertainty among the business community and send discouraging signals to potential investors in our State of West Virginia.

So, Mr. President, you may ask why am I willing to stand up on the Senate floor the first day of this session to fight for this program.

Those of us from rural States know that over the last decade, air service to our communities would have been worse and, in many cases, nonexistent were it not for the Essential-Air Service Program. We strongly believe that the less than $32 million, the cost of the entire EAS Program nationwide, is a very reasonable and a very worthwhile expenditure. For less than $32 million, we are connecting rural America with the rest of the country so that people can go to colleges, can meet with their families, and can obtain better health care services.

From my point of view, most importantly, the Essential Air Service Program provides rural America a chance at an economic future. Without a reliable source of air transportation linking up rural America with the rest of the country, the chance at an economy recovery is bleak. That is true in my rural State. That is true in a lot of rural States.

One of the first questions that industry asks when they come to a State is, "Where is your airport?" If you do not have an answer, if you do not have air service, their interest diminishes rapidly.

Mr. President, I learned this lesson first-hand in 1987. I have been very active in trying to attract research and development to our leading research university, West Virginia University. I worked extremely hard to get the president of the National Science Foundation, Erich Bloch, to come to West Virginia University with his staff to look at the research that we are doing there. Never before had a director of the National Science Foundation come to West Virginia University, our leading research university. So, obviously, this was important.

I am afraid, however, that Mr. Bloch and his staff may be reluctant to come back because Mr. Bloch could not get there using regular air service. He had to charter a private plane to return to Washington. There were no return flights so he had to charter a flight. His staff had to stay overnight because the plane was not big enough. The next morning when they arrived at Morgantown Airport to get on their commuter service, it was canceled, as they so often are. As a result, they had to drive back to Washington, DC. What if it had been a flight from Nebraska? What if it had been from North Dakota?

Recently, we tried to encourage the airlines to include West Virginia in their tour packages. I brought executives from an international airline to my State. I took them to the most beautiful parts of our State because tourism is one of the ways that we have to bring jobs to West Virginia.

These people came. They had to use commuter airline service, and I was glad that we had that air service. But, on the other hand, they said they could not fit their skis, they could not fit their golf clubs into those commuter airlines. I do not play golf. I do not ski, but a lot of people do. If you do not have decent air transportation, you get cut off in lots of ways that folks who live in big cities do not know anything about.

For communities like Elkins, Morgantown, Beckley, the home county of my esteemed senior colleague, Senator BYRD, Clarksburg/Fairmont, Princeton/Bluefield, the Essential Air Service Program is basic to their economic life.

I urge the Members of this body, Mr. President, to join me in my plea to the Secretary of Transportation and to the Secretary-designate to refrain from going forward with their plans for shutting off Essential Air Service subsidies before they give us a chance to find a way to fund the program.

Mr. PRESSLER. Will my colleague yield? I want to compliment my colleague, and I will be brief. His words are music to my ears. I can merely substitute the names of South Dakota cities that have the same problems. I am proud to be a cosponsor. It is a matter we worked together on. I look forward to working with him.

I want to compliment the Senator for his leadership.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I thank the distinguished Senator. I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to cosponsor this Senate concurrent resolution on the Essential Air Service Program that has been introduced by my very distinguished colleague from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER]. A good transportation system is a keystone to building a more prosperous future for West Virginia and other rural States.

One element of a modern transportation system, is reliable and reasonable air transportation.

This is why I supported the passage of legislation to enact the Essential Air Service Program over 10 years ago, and why last year I joined in cosponsoring legislation to extend the EAS Program for an additional 10 years.

This program has enabled five West Virginia airports—Morgantown, Clarksburg/Fairmont, Elkins, Beckley, and Bluefield/Princeton—to provide regularly scheduled air service.

Recently, due to a $6.6 million shortfall, the Department of Transportation proposed eliminating essential air service to a number of communities nationwide—including most of those in West Virginia—beginning March 1, in an effort to compensate for that shortfall.

Because of the importance of the EAS Program to West Virginia's economic development efforts, I urged DOT to delay any action on its proposal until Congress could address this issue.

I am pleased that DOT has agreed to my request.

Subsequently I have met with the Secretary of Transportation designee, Samuel Skinner, to urge that he delay any action that would terminate EAS service.

I am encouraged that Mr. Skinner has assured me that, if he is confirmed in his nomination, he will work with Congress on this matter, and will place the dilemma confronting the EAS Program at the top of his agenda.

This is an important issue, and I certainly will work to consider every available opportunity, including additional appropriations, to ensure that essential air service continues to be provided to West Virginia communities, and the nearly 150 other communities nationwide that participate in the program.

Today's resolution, offered by my colleague, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, provides the opportunity for the entire Senate to be on record on this issue. I commend my colleague for introducing the resolution; and I join with him in urging my colleagues to join as cosponsors.

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from West Virginia for giving the Senate the opportunity to go on record in support of the Essential Air Service [EAS] Program. I strongly support this effort as a way of sending a signal to the Department of Transportation that congressional support for EAS is alive and well.

I also thank the Secretary of Transportation for delaying action on the proposed EAS cutbacks for 60 days. Although this is a minimal amount of time in which to expect Senate action, it is better than the January 30 deadline we faced at one point.

Speeches about saving EAS have become an annual tradition. The last administration was never interested in continuation of EAS and wished to eliminate it. With a new President now in office and a new Secretary of Transportation in the confirmation process, I hope administration attitudes toward EAS will change.

The possibility of losing air service because of a cut in EAS payments has sent shock waves throughout rural and small urban America. The Department of Transportation has proposed four options for cutting EAS payments in order to make up for a $6.6 million shortfall. In South Dakota, there are five EAS cities receiving subsidized air service. Under any of the four cost-cutting options, at least one city would be affected.

Why is there such concern? Once a city loses air service, it immediately loses a vital link to the rest of the world. Economic development is sent on a downward spiral. The ability to attract or even retain businesses that operate in the modern world is hampered because of this lack of a vital connection to the national economy.

One of the cities facing a possible reduction in EAS payments is Pierre, SD, the State capital. Pierre is about 200 miles from another larger city. Even with a population of 12,000, Pierre is not on an interstate or four-lane highway, has no passenger train service, and only one scheduled bus stop per day. The only viable form of transportation is by air. Many business people, State government officials, and other travelers depend heavily on a carrier relying on EAS payments. In other words, an end to EAS means cutting off cities like Pierre from accessible transportation.

There are many similar examples across the country. Congress has understood the importance of EAS by reauthorizing the program for 10 years. The resolution introduced today reaffirms our commitment and sends another message to the Department of Transportation and to the new administration that EAS must be preserved.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I join the senior Senator from West Virginia—the President pro tempore of the Senate—and the junior Senator from West Virginia, Senator ROCKFELLER, in support of the resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Department of Transportation refrain from cutting back essential air service until the Congress has sufficient time to pass a supplemental appropriation.

Mr. President, when Congress voted to deregulate the airlines in 1978, I was concerned about the effect it would have on rural communities and therefore voted against deregulation. I take little satisfaction in knowing that my predictions of rural economic havoc have come true.

Compared to some of the other issues that come before this body, air service to rural communities may seem like small potatoes. But I assure you, it is extraordinarily important. Access to adequate air service often determines whether a community lives or dies.

Last month, the Department of Transportation proposed eliminating air service to many rural communities across the country. Cutbacks were deemed necessary to make up for a $6.6 million funding shortfall in the Essential Air Service Program which Congress appropriated last fall. This is a very small amount of money for such a critical program.

One of the alternatives for cutting back on service would have eliminated service to seven Montana communities: Glasgow, Glendive, Havre, Lewistown, Miles City, Sidney, and Wolf Point. Such a proposal is irresponsible and unacceptable.

The effect would have been to virtually cut off half of the State of Montana from the rest of the world. Residents in Glasgow would have had to drive 282 miles to catch a plane. That's further than driving from here to Raleigh, NC. People living in Glendive and Wolf Point would have to drive the distance between here and New York City.

One business in Wolf Point, which employs 58 people, Wood's Powr Grip, would be forced to leave that community if air service were eliminated. That company needs to be able to get supplies to and from its customers on a timely basis. Without air service, such business dealings are impossible. There are many more businesses like Wood's Powr Grip in the same situation.

Rural America is already suffering an economic crisis. There is growth in urban areas, especially on the coasts, but there are gaping holes in between. Farmers, ranchers, miners and other rural businesses are struggling to survive.

Had DOT's proposal been implemented, affected rural economies would have been dealt a devastating blow.

That is why I wrote to then President-elect Bush and told him I intended to hold up every nomination he made to the Department of Transportation until I was satisfied that no cuts would be made in the Essential Air Service Program.

I also invited DOT Secretary-designate Samuel Skinner to meet with myself and 21 other Senators, Republicans and Democrats, to discuss his position on the Essential Air Service Program prior to his confirmation vote by the Senate.

In addition, I scheduled a hearing in the Rural Economy Subcommittee of the Small Business Committee, which I chair, to discuss the effects elimination of air service would have had on communities involved.

I am pleased, Mr. President, that because DOT has delayed implementing a final rule until Congress has a chance to pass a supplemental appropriation, neither the filibuster, nor the meeting, nor the hearing will have to be held.

In an effort to ensure that this battle does not happen again and again, year after year, I will soon be introducing legislation to fund the Essential Air Services Program through the aviation trust fund. I think this action is critical so that rural communities can plan for the future and attract business investment without fear that air service may one day be eliminated.

In addition, barely a year ago, Congress passed legislation introduced by Senator EXON and myself to enhance and strengthen the EAS Program. Because I believe such enhancements are critical for business development and job creation in rural communities, I will push hard for full funding of the program this year.

Finally, last week I invited Mr. Skinner to visit the Montana cities served by the Essential Air Service Program. This trip will demonstrate to Mr. Skinner how important the EAS Program is and why I am so opposed to cutting it back.

Mr. President, I commend my colleague, Senator ROCKEFELLER, today for introducing this resolution to express the sense of Congress that the DOT should not implement a final rule on EAS until Congress has a chance to vote for a supplemental appropriation.

I urge my other colleagues to join our efforts to preserve this vital program for rural communities.

I ask unanimous consent that copies of the letters I sent to then President-elect Bush and Mr. Skinner appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, December 23, 1988.

HON. GEORGE BUSH,
President-Elect, Office of the President-Elect, 1825 Connecticut Avenue, NW., Washington, DC.

DEAR PRESIDENT-ELECT BUSH: I have recently been informed that the Department of Transportation has released a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM 88-18) that could eliminate seven of Montana's eight essential air service points. This proposal is irresponsible and unacceptable.

According to the Department of Transportation, the reason they are proposing such cutbacks is because of a $6.6 million funding shortfall in the program which Congress appropriated earlier this fall. The Department has decided to make cutbacks administratively instead of allowing Congress time to pass a supplemental appropriation. I assure you that I will do everything within my power to be sure this does not happen.

Few issues are more important to me than ensuring that Montanans receive adequate air transportation. The availability and affordability of quality air service is an essential ingredient to the economic vitality of every state in the Union. Without adequate air transportation, Montana's economy, which is already suffering from depressed conditions, would be dealt a severe blow. I am appalled that an agency of the federal government would see fit to decide that the more urban states should prosper at the expense of rural states.

The purpose of this letter is to inform you that I intend to hold up every nomination you make to the Department of Transportation until I am satisfied that no cuts will be made in the Essential Air Service program. I have nothing against your nominees personally, but I assure you that I can garner enough support for my position in the Senate to block every DOT nomination until this issue is resolved to my satisfaction.

It seems to me that this is a ridiculous way to start out a new Administration. This program is critical to rural communities of this country and would require a very small supplemental appropriation of $6.6 million to take care of the problem. Congress should be allowed time to approve such legislation.

Surely, you would agree that a major battle over this small, but extremely important, program in the opening days of the 101st Congress would be unfortunate. I urge you to resolve this issue before Congress convenes in January. Thank you for your prompt consideration of my request.

With best personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

MAX BAUCUS.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 6, 1989.

SAMUEL SKINNER,
Secretary-designate, Department of Transportation, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY-DESIGNATE: Congratulations on your recent nomination to be Secretary of Transportation during the Bush Administration. As Secretary, you would be responsible for air service policy to the rural communities of our country.

As Senators representing states with many rural and small communities, we are extremely concerned about the recent Notice of Proposed Rule Making, NPRM 88-18, addressing possible cutbacks in service to rural communities served by the Essential Air Service program. Under the proposal, 94 rural communities across the country could lose essential air service. This result is irresponsible and unacceptable.

Rural communities expect and deserve a high quality air transportation system. The availability and affordability of quality air service is an essential ingredient to the economic vitality of every state in the Union. It is a crucial factor in a state's ability to enhance it's economy. Quality air service provides growth potential for existing businesses and industries, and provides an important incentive for attracting new businesses and industries.

Because we feel strongly that rural communities must continue to receive adequate air service, we would like to meet with you at your earliest convenience to discuss actions you plan to take as Secretary of Transportation with regard to rural air service. We request that such a meeting occur before the Senate votes on your confirmation.

Thank you for your time and consideration of our concerns. If you have any questions about this request, please feel free to call me or have your staff call Tamara McCann of my staff at 224-2651. We look forward to meeting with you at your earliest convenience.

With best personal regards, I am

Sincerely,

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to voice my support for Senator ROCKEFELLER's resolution to postpone the implementation of the Department of Transportation's proposal to curtail essential air service subsidies until Congress has had the opportunity to provide the necessary additional funding.

Air service plays a vital role in helping communities stimulate their economic growth and development. Since 1978, the Essential Air Service Program has successfully protected many smaller communities from being cut off from air travel. In 1987, Congress demonstrated its strong support for this program by expanding it and reauthorizing it for another 10 years. Over 150 communities nationwide, including 8 in Michigan, benefited from this program during 1988.

The Department of Transportation's proposal takes the wrong approach in addressing the $6.6 million shortfall in the essential air service budget. Instead of compensating for the shortfall by cutting communities out of the program, we should be searching for additional funds to maintain service to all these communities.

Furthermore, the timing of Transportation's proposal could not have been worse. The public comment period on their proposal, which was initially scheduled to run from December 14 through January 3 and was later unofficially extended through January 17, made it impossible for Congress to consider alternative solutions to the funding shortfall.

I have been encouraged, however, by the more accommodating stance taken by the Transportation Department in the last week. Their decision to put off implementing any such regulations for 60 days and Transportation Secretary-designate Skinner's recent talks with Senator BYRD, in his capacity as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, have demonstrated a willingness to work with Congress on this situation. I hope that this willingness will continue and that they will continue to cooperate with Congress in areas of mutual concern.

But it is the Congress which must act and act quickly if air service to these communities is to be maintained. In preventing the Secretary of Transportation from reducing essential air service subsidies until Congress has a chance to appropriate supplemental funding, this resolution would be the first step toward ensuring that air service to our Nation's rural communities is maintained. I urge its immediate passage and urge that the Senate promptly begin searching for the necessary additional funding for the Essential Air Service Program.

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, in 1987 Congress reaffirmed its commitment to the survival of rural communities by extending the Essential Air Service Program for 10 years. The resolution before us today makes clear that the commitment has not waivered by expressing the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of Transportation refrain from reducing EAS subsidies to rural communities until Congress has had an opportunity to address the funding shortfall.

Last month, the Department of Transportation announced its plan to meet a shortfall in EAS funding through the elimination of subsidies to specific communities nationwide. That plan offered four alternatives, each of which would allocate EAS spending cuts differently throughout the country, with some States being hit harder than others. This divide and conquer approach, which appears designed to pit winners against losers among the States, is, in my view, an unacceptable response to the problem of EAS funding shortall.

Many small cities and towns across this country are dependent on access to commercial air service for their economic vitality. When hearings were held on extending EAS during the 100th Congress, A recurrent theme in the expert testimony was that, without commercial air service, the economic stability of small communities nationwide would be in jeopardy, and that, without EAS, there would likely be no commercial air service in those areas.

When Congress reauthorized this program, its intent was clear—EAS, which constitutes an irreplaceable lifeline to participating localities, should be continued. The Department of Transportation, in preparing proposals to cut that lifeline, is undervaluing the crucial nature of this program and subverting the overwhelming support of the Congress for its ongoing operation.

In South Dakota, five communities are currently receiving EAS subsidies. Officials from each of those cities have articulated the devastating impact the DOT proposals would have on their communities. Existing firms need air transportation to maintain current levels of operation, and new businesses will not locate in areas which do not have commercial air service.

Nationwide, 150 locations benefit from EAS. Any member of this body with an isolated EAS community in his or her State can verify that removing EAS designation is nothing less than an attack on the vitality of rural America as a whole.

Last week, DOT announced a 60-day delay in their plans to eliminate EAS subsidies. That de facto extension does not decrease the severity of the threat to EAS or the importance of the resolution being introduced in the Senate today. Before leaving office, President Reagan again listed EAS for termination in his fiscal year 1989 budget. That objective is clearly reflected in DOT's proposal.

The resolution being introduced today sends a clear message to DOT; any plan to address shortfalls in EAS funding by stripping isolated cities and towns of their sole source of commercial air service is way of the mark. It is the intention of a majority of the Members of Congress that EAS continue to provide its vital service to rural communities in this Nation, and that any future efforts by the Department to promulgate rules on this program should be guided by that intent. I hope that the new administration will consider that position and work with the Congress to maintain a viable EAS program.

ON THE ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE PROGRAM

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this Senate resolution which calls upon the Secretary of Transportation to refrain from making cuts in the Essential Air Service Program until Congress has the opportunity to address the issues.

I was pleased by the good faith shown in the recent action by the Department of Transportation to delay by 60 days the implementation of air service reductions earlier proposed by the Reagan administration. However, we only won a small battle. We still need to win the war.

This is not just an issue for current fiscal year 1989 rural air service. It is also for fiscal year 1990 and future years. It is whether there will be any EAS program at all. I was very disappointed that the fiscal year 1990 budget submitted to Congress by President Reagan shortly before he left office once again cut all funds for EAS and proposed terminating EAS completely.

In my home State of Nebraska, that would mean total loss of passenger air service to the communities of Alliance, Chadron, Columbus, Hastings, Kearney, McCook, Norfolk, and Sidney.

In addition, Grand Island, North Platte, and Scottsbluff would lose some or most of their air passenger service. I call on our new President to take a kinder and gentler approach to these Nebraska communities and reverse this proposal to terminate their air service.

Hopefully, Congress and our new President can address the long term funding issue of the EAS program, so that these EAS communities know where they stand. Unfortunately, saving EAS from termination has become an annual battle.

How can these communities effectively undertake economic development efforts, which are so badly needed in rural Nebraska, when Washington puts their air service in a continual on-again off-again on-again state? Questions about air service are among the first asked by businesses making location decisions.

We badly need some stability and certainty in the EAS program. I will work hard to try to bring that about and look forward to working with my colleagues on the issue.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join the Senator from West Virginia in supporting this resolution to put a stop to the DOT's rulemaking reducing rural air service subisidies. Last year this body overwhelmingly approved a 10-year extension of the Essential Air Service Program. Now it is time for us to stick by that action. While we may not be prepared to reregulate the airlines, we must realize that there are 40 million or more people in rural areas who require basic levels of air service. Airline deregulation in an imperfect world has meant the loss of service to rural areas. That is not to say that there has not been an overall improvement in the system and occasional bargains on air fares for some. But if you take a look at my State of North Dakota, you see that what goes for residents of most capital cities does not go for a resident of Bismarck.

In fact, air fares from Bismarck to the nearest hub at Minneapolis are higher than fares from Minneapolis to Miami. It is the small local business traveler who pays. I am most concerned that the loss of subsidized air service will have a significant negative impact on the economy of our rural areas. In my opinion, the Department of Transportation proposals in this rulemaking do not begin to address these economic concerns. I think we can all agree that the continual attacks on this program have been tedious. Our local general aviation airports have spent a lot of time and money fighting these cuts. I hope that in the spirit of cooperation we are able to convey to the new administration the importance to rural America of Essential Air Service and other transportation programs.

I ask unanimous consent that certain comments submitted by the North Dakota State Aeronautics Commission be included with my statement in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESPONSE TO THE DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION'S PROPOSED RULEMAKING RELATING TO ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE; REDUCTION ALTERNATIVES AND REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REPLY FROM JANUARY 3, 1989 TO MARCH 1, 1989

CONCLUSION

Due to the length of this document in response to the NPRM and the explicit nature of the reply, the following conclusion summarizes this communication as:

Commission recommends the DOT implement with Congress a supplemental appropriation, based on accurate forecasts of financial assistance to maintain basic levels of service as to not interupt service. With our six months knowledge of the appropriation amount, this drastic action was uncalled for and demands immediate DOT staff management action as the 101st Congress convenes.

The economic impact of this action is substantial over $100 million under the Executive Order 12291 and also under Regulatory Flexibility Act, numerous small N.D. businesses are impacted, both directly and indirectly overlooked by the DOT NPRM.

Air Service benefits not only local residents, but in North Dakota, a majority of traffic is the business related traveler from all points across the nation.

Carriers respond that subsidy cutbacks would eliminate or substantially reduce service at all three North Dakota cities.

Support only Alternative No. 1, if forced, to make a choice if Congressional supplemental funding fails.

Petition for extension of time to reply to March 1, 1989 so Congressional representatives can respond to the EAS funding deficiency.

In final thought, the Aeronautics Commission feels that the DOT has failed to understand conceptually the impact EAS benefits to North Dakota communities in preparing the NPRM and Congressional budget request in June, 1988. Without the cooperation by the DOT in reacting to Congressional intent, the EAS program will continually be a "battle ground" due to the DOT's lack of knowledge of the program benefits. The State and communities as users of the EAS service, strongly convey the program benefits as not a measure to cut the benefit and prove a point, but rather a program that all citizens from all parts of the USA benefit from and well worth the investment made by the taxpayers.

NORTH DAKOTA
AERONAUTICS COMMISSION,
By Gary R. Ness, Director.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER]. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this measure to ensure that rural communities in this country are not cutoff from commercial air service.

Under the recent Department of Transportation's Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, up to 94 rural communities could lose air service now made possible by the Essential Air Service Program. This program was established after the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 to ensure that, after deregulation, these rural communities would continue to maintain commercial air service. Congress renewed its support for the program, last year, by extending it for at least another 10 years.

One community in my State—Ely, NV—would be affected by the cuts proposed by the Department of Transportation. As the name of the program indicates, the air service it provides is essential to these rural communities. As noted by the chairman of the White Pine Board of County Commissioners, where Ely is located, "The loss of our air service would be devastating and would undermine the years of local and State effort to revive Ely's economy."

Let me briefly illustrate the importance of air service to this small Nevada community. Ely is 346 miles from Reno—about a 6 hour drive. The nearest nonsubsidized airport is 188 miles away in Elko, NV—about a 4 hour drive—if the weather is good.

Ely has no rail service and bus transportation is available only on Mondays and Fridays.

The loss of commercial air service would leave the 8,040 residents of White Pine County without any regularly scheduled public transportation and would be devastating to the area's economy.

A new $36 million State prison is nearing completion and one of the criteria for siting the prison in Ely was the availability of air service. Congress recently designated the Great Basin as a National Park which is now a growing tourist area. The only airport serving visitors to the Nation's newest park is the Ely airport. In short, the availability of air service is vital to the revival of the economy of this Nevada community.

I hope my colleagues will support this resolution urging the Secretary of Transportation to refrain from making any cuts in the Essential Air Service Program—and maintain air service to our rural communities—until Congress has had an opportunity to provide for the necessary supplementary appropriation.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my good friend from West Virginia, Senator ROCKEFELLER, in attempting to maintain the Essential Air Service Program [EAS] at the level necessary to serve our rural communities.

The Department of Transportation recently announced proposals to reduce subsidies to this program by $6.6 million due to a funding shortfall. DOT has recently responded favorably to a request by a number of Senators, myself included, to delay implementing these reductions for 60 days. Our request for a delay was made with the intention of allowing Congress the opportunity to enact a supplemental appropriation, and I am very hopeful that this action will be taken soon.

For the citizens of Jonesboro, Hot Springs, Camden, El Dorado, and Harrison, AR, the Essential Air Services Program provides the only air service available to such major business centers as Dallas, Memphis, and St. Louis. This service is not a luxury, but a necessity for these primarily small, rural, Arkansas communities who have come to rely a great deal on the EAS program in order to maintain their economic vitality.

There can be little doubt that eliminating quick and ready access to these large trade centers—as is currently provided by the EAS—will mean slow or negative economic growth for rural economies.

I can not speak for other States, but for Arkansas the Essential Air Services is precisely that—essential. I look forward to working with my colleagues in the next few weeks to formulate a plan which will preserve this much needed program.

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise to join others who are talking about the importance of the essential air service.

My colleague Senator DIXON from Illinois and I sent a letter to the new Secretary of Transportation. I discussed this service with him as I am sure my colleague has. I think we are making headway.

Let me just say it is extemely important to small communities. Mount Vernon IL, is expanding its business base but it needs that air service. Sterling Rock Falls, IL, expanding its industrial base, moves from 25 percent unemployment down to 75 percent. Let's not turn that around. It is going to hurt us in unemployment figures and as I heard Senator BAUCUS mention before, it is going to hurt urban areas not only simply through the reason he mentioned that they need to get supplies from these smaller communities. When you cannot get a job in Mount Vernon, IL, or Sterling Rock Falls, IL, you end up going to Chicago, you go to St. Louis, you go to Indianapolis. You compound the problems of urban America.

My hope is that we can act and act quickly to save this essential air service for these rural communities. It is really important for these communities. I would point out that out of 550 designated essential air service communities, only 150 require subsidies. And those subsidies, in part, obviously are for small carriers, but when those small carriers provide the feeder service ultimately those central airports and main air lines also benefit from it.

As I indicated, I have every reason to believe that the new Secretary of Transportation is going to be sympathetic to this situation. I have discussed this with him and I believe my colleague Senator DIXON has also. We have been in touch. He indicated to me that he is aware of the problem and is sensitive and I might add he is a pilot himself so I have the feeling that we are making progress in that area.

I am pleased to join in cosponsoring the resolution on Essential Air Service [EAS] offered today by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER].

Ten years after airline deregulation, it is clearer than ever that the benefits would have largely passed the Nation's smaller communities by without the promise of Essential Air Service. The purpose of EAS, which was renewed by Congress last year, is to assure that a basic level of air carrier service be maintained for communities which had already had air carrier service in place before deregulation occurred. Only when no carrier is willing to provide that service is a subsidy necessary.

Air carrier service is now the mode of choice in today's international business climate and essential for passengers in remote rural communities. This is not the time to fall back on the promise of predictable air carrier service to those communities whose economic life is at stake.

This program affects the lives of thousands of citizens and promotes far more in social and economic benefits than its small price tag implies. Only 150 out of 550 eligible communities actually receive subsidized service, and it is my hope that many of these will eventually stand on their own. Unfortunately the EAS appropriation of $25 million for this year fell short by $6.6 million to maintain current services according to the Department of Transportation [DOT]. Last year DOT spent $28.5 million on EAS, but eliminated the program from the fiscal year 1989 budget.

Instead DOT issued a 20-day proposed rulemaking over Christmas setting out criteria for the elimination of service for over 50 communities by March 1, in spite of the purpose of the EAS program. That rulemaking has been postponed for at least 60 days which gives Congress an opportunity to renew our promise to those EAS communities by providing the $6.6 million to maintain those services, and to work with the new administration to improve the program as well. That is why I am urging my colleagues to support Senator ROCKEFELLER's resolution today.

In Illinois both of the EAS communities, Mount Vernon and Sterling Rock Falls, are beginning to experience a turnaround in their economies thanks to the promise of scheduled air carrier service. That recovery is fragile. In Mount Vernon, the General Tire Co., a consortium of Japanese, German, and American interests, is building a $200 million facility. Everbrite is about to open their new plant. One plant, PNC, Inc. has converted an operation with three caretakers into a plant with 180 employees.

The heavy manufacturing in Sterling/Rock Falls is only now recovering from a deep recession. Unemployment has been reduced from 25 percent to 7.1 percent. Companies like the Northwestern Steel and Wire, Illinois Forge, National Manufacturing, Wahl Clippers and Lawrence Brothers all depend on air carrier access to the national and in some cases international carriers as well as to the city of Chicago.

We are becoming top heavy as a nation with population settling in the larger congested urban regions as rural communities are allowed to decline. At a minimum, we need to maintain scheduled air carrier service to the currently subsidized communities. States, local governments, and the private sector, according to the ability to pay, should be allowed to participate with the Federal Government in making the air service possible. This would relieve pressure on the Federal budget, stretch the small amount of dollars further, and continue to support a basic minimum of air carrier service for the most isolated and poorer communities.

Mr. President, I see that the time of 3 o'clock has arrived and I know we are to move into executive session.

I hope that we will act expeditiously on this resolution that the two Senators from West Virginia and others have cosponsored.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, the very distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER] as a cosponsor of his sense of the Senate resolution requiring the Secretary of Transportation to refrain from taking any action that would result in reduced Essential Air Service [EAS] subsidies to our rural communities until Congress has the chance to address the $6.6 million funding shortfall for fiscal year 1989.

Congress has continually expressed its support of Essential Air Service by reauthorizing it in 1987 and continually funding it. The Department of Transportation's timing is no mistake and I think it is only fair that the U.S. Senate has a chance to address the funding shortfall if we so choose.

I represent the State of Montana and we have seen rural communities that could be effected by any cutbacks in EAS subsidies. If EAS is terminated, crucial medical services and supplies would be severely curtailed as some rural Montana communities depend on air service for weekly visits from medical technicians. Distance in much of Montana prevent these medical technicians from visiting patients in these communities by surface transportation, their only alternative is by air. Similarly, many small businesses that are located in rural communities depend upon regularly scheduled air service to maintain their business links with their customers and others. If EAS is terminated, many people will lose their jobs in what are already economically depressed areas. The small businesses and farms in eastern Montana rely on air service for delivery of goods and the loss of it would impair their ability to prosper or possible even survive.

Regularly scheduled air service is a fact of life in 20th century America. and those areas without such service labor under a tremendous handicap.

Montana has been particularly hard hit in the transportation services arena. Montana has lost the service of a major portion of its rail capacity, Amtrak service, bus service, and trucking industry. The threatened loss of EAS continues a downward spiral in the quality of transportation services available to the people of Montana.

I am very aware of the budget deficit problems that need to be dealt with this Congress. But cutting EAS to many rural communities is not the place to start. It further hurts the economy of those States most in need of an economic boost and I think most people would agree that reducing revenue is not the answer to reducing the deficit.

I look forward to working with Senator ROCKEFELLER and others who have similar concerns during this Congress and hope that we can resolve this issue in a timely manner.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am proud to be an original cosponsor of my distinguished colleague Senator ROCKEFELLER's resolution to protect air service in rural communities. I share his concern and I would like to associate myself with his eloquent remarks regarding the Essential Air Service Program. Indeed, the word "essential" appears in the title of the program for good reason. I was heartened by Secretary-designate Skinner's response to questions posed by Senator ROCKEFELLER this morning in the Commerce Committee hearing on his nomination. He appears to be willing to work with Congress to protect this important program. I sincerely hope the issue can be resolved.

In the State of Nevada, one community receives these subsidies. Ely, NV, in White Pine County is just the kind of rural community that the EAS is designed to protect. The economy there is dependent on the air service, and, in fact, the EAS Program has been the reason for economic growth in the area. Air service in rural America has to be a part of this country's National Transportation Policy. Support for deregulation in the airline industry must be tempered by the realization that we cannot abandon transportation service to our rural communities because they fall on the wrong side of the profit margin.

I travel often throughout Nevada and I am always amazed by the high prices of air service in certain areas. In fact, the cost of air service between Nevada's two largest cities, Las Vegas and Reno, has become prohibitively high and there is only one carrier between these two major metropolitan areas. Something is wrong when my flight from Washington, DC, to Las Vegas costs as much as the trip from Las Vegas to Reno. The Essential Air Service Program has been set up to protect some of these iniquities, and I am a strong supporter of its goals.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 7—SENSE OF CONGRESS RELATIVE TO THE MURDER OF "CHICO" MENDES FILHO

Mr. KASTEN (for himself and Mr. LEAHY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 7

Whereas the murder of Brazilian environmentalist and union leader Francisco "Chico" Mendes Filho has provided outrage and sorrow in the Congress of the United States and around the world;

Whereas Chico Mendes gave his life defending the Amazon forest and the peoples of the forest and creating a more equitable, economic form of preserving the forest;

Whereas the destruction of the Amazon forest is despoiling the largest repository of biological diversity on the planet and contributing to global climate change, gravely threatening the quality of life on the planet for future generations; and

Whereas the death of Chico Mendes and many others since 1980, who, like him, have sought solutions to the global environmental crisis in their daily work, in seeking an equitable distribution and use of land in Brazil, is a tragedy, an abuse of human rights, and a threat to the global environment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress—

(1) recognizes that the murder on December 22, 1988, of "Chico" Mendes Filho is a profound loss to all those concerned with the global environment and social justice, and presents a challenge to confront the waste and destruction of global natural resources and social injustice with courage and conviction, as Chico Mendes did;

(2) recognizes that Chico Mendes made an important contribution to the protection of the global environment through his defense of threatened tropical forest and of the peoples of the forest and through his success in promoting an ecologically and economically sound alternative for the development of the Amazon, the creation of "extractive reserves; and

(3) urges the Secretary of State to express to the Government of Brazil the concern of the people of the United States at the murder of Chico Mendes and their desire that all those directly and indirectly responsible be brought swiftly to justice.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the Secretary of State.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a concurrent resolution honoring one of the most dedicated people ever to defend the world's environment—Francisco "Chico" Mendes Filho of Brazil.

This morning a group of Chico's friends in the U.S. House and Senate gathered at a memorial service in his honor. We must use the slaying of Chico Mendes as an opportunity to rededicate ourselves to the goal of preserving the world's rain forests—and the health of the entire planet.

With these goals in mind, I am submitting this concurrent resolution today.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, it is with profound sadness that I rise to join my colleague in submitting a concurrent resolution expressing the outrage of this Congress over the recent murder of Brazilian environmentalist and union leader, Francisco "Chico" Mendes Filho.

While few of us knew Mendes personally, we were all the beneficiaries of his outstanding work. As founder and leader of Brazil's first rubber tappers union, he labored tirelessly to protect and preserve his country's besieged rain forest from ill-considered exploitation, human settlement, and wanton destruction. Over the years, he earned a reputation within the environmental community as one of its premier spokesmen—a man of passion, and of vision, whose concern for the future of his country's ecological patrimony was unbounded.

Mr. President, for over a decade Mendes strove to preserve one of the last great natural habitats left on Earth. It is a habitat which scientists are only now coming to realize is an essential element in the life cycle of our planet. The principal weapon Mendes used in this crusade was peaceful persuasion. Many of those who opposed his work used fear, intimidation, and ultimately, assassination, to advance their interests. On December 12, after five attempts on his life, Mendes was gunned down by a lone assailant as he left the back door of his home—a fate this courageous man knew he risked every day in his work to save the Brazilian rain forests.

Mr. President, today environmentalists the world over are in mourning, not just for one man lost in the struggle to save the rain forests, but for what has been done to the planet Earth. For today we stand witness to a worldwide environmental crisis of astounding proportions. It is one which threatens to destroy our atmosphere and alter our climate in ways which, until recently, were familiar to most of us only through the works of popular science fiction writers. Unfortunately, as Mendes knew all too well, fiction is in danger of becoming fact.

In Brazil alone, land is being cleared at a rate of 1 acre per minute. This translated into a loss of 80,000 square miles last year—a land area equal in size to New England, New Jersey, and Delaware put together. Already a major portion of the virgin Amazon rain forest has been irreparably lost to future generations. Unbelievably, most of the Amazon was unexplored as recently as 20 years ago.

Mr. President, Francisco Mendes was in the forefront of those who have dedicated their lives to saving our battered environment. In June 1987, he was recognized by the United Nations Environment Program [UNEP], as one of the world's top 50 ecology workers.

He also received a tribute from the Better World Society for his pioneering work.

Mr. President, it is a testatment to the power of bold ideas that 3,000 people turned out for the funeral of Francisco Mendes last December. His admirers came from all walks of Brazilian life—rural workers, environmentalists, politicians, and celebrities. As a result of his death, however, the popular cry for a reform of Brazil's environmental policies has grown more vigorous. It is our duty to see to it that this momentum goes forward and the memory of Francisco Mendes is kept alive.

Mr. President, perhaps, in the years ahead, our children will be able to look back and say that the death of Francisco Mendes Filho, "Chico," marked a turning point in our struggle to save the rain forests of Brazil. Perhaps, his death will not have been in vain.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 8—SENSE OF CONGRESS RELATIVE TO AN INTERNATIONAL AGRICULTURAL TREATY

Mr. PRESSLER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

S. CON. RES. 8

Whereas worldwide grain supplies reached a record level of 350 million metric tons during the 1980s—almost two years of grain imports;

Whereas world food production has historically increased at a rate of 2.5 percent during the 1980s and world farm output has increased at a rate of more than 3 percent annually;

Whereas approximately one-fifth of the world's cropland is experiencing an intolerable rate of soil erosion;

Whereas the cost of farm programs is a record levels in many nations;

Whereas agricultural export markets are declining due to increased productivity in food importing nations; and

Whereas other grain exporting nations have expressed a need to limit agricultural production: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (a) it is the sense of the Congress that the President should initiate multilateral negotiations with all major agricultural producing nations to establish an international agricultural conservation reserve to reduce worldwide grain surpluses and control soil erosion.

(b) The basis for such an international agricultural conservation reserve would be as follows:

(1) All signatory nations would agree not to bring any virgin land into crop production and to return a certain percentage of cropland to its natural state and keep the land out of production for a minimum of 10 years. The amount of land to be taken out of production shall be large enough to bring grain supplies in line with demand while still maintaining adequate food supplies.

(2) Cropland would have to be taken out of production and sound conservation practices implemented on the land to control soil erosion. Land taken out of production would not have to be classified as highly erodible.

(3) An emergency provision would allow a portion of the land of all signatory nations to be put back in production if stocks fell below a level assuring adequate food supplies.

(4) Individual nations could return a portion of their land to production if their production did not meet domestic consumption.

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am submitting a sense of the Congress resolution urging the administration to initiate multilateral negotiations with all major agricultural exporting nations to establish an international agricultural conservation reserve. An international land reserve would reduce grain surpluses and control soil erosion. Excess grain supplies, high farm program costs, declining export markets, and worldwide soil depletion problems lend urgency to the establishment of such an agreement.

My concurrent resolution expresses the sense of the Congress that the administration should initiate multilateral negotiations on an international agricultural conservation reserve program. All participating nations would benefit. Under this program, the world's grain exporting nations would agree not to bring any virgin land into production and to return an equal percentage of their cropland to grass or other natural cover. The land would be kept out of production for a minimum of 10 years. The resulting decline in production would lead to an increase in grain market prices, as well as significant soil conservation benefits. Emergency provisions would be included to allow land to be brought back into production if grain shortages were projected or a nation's production fell below domestic consumption.

The agreement could also include a provision for an internationally coordinated food aid program. Each participating nation would be required to contribute a certain percentage of production for food aid.

The reasons supporting an international land set-aside are readily apparent. Worldwide carryover grain stocks reached record levels in this decade, a result of increased production and declining export demand. Although U.S. grain production fell in 1988 due to the severe drought, other nations continued to produce grain in excess amounts. Historically, agricultural production has increased at a rate of 2.5 percent annually. During the 1980's, world farm production has increased at a rate of over 3 percent, and food production has outpaced world food demand. Excess food must either be stockpiled or exported.

Huge grain surpluses and intense competition for exports dramatically increased farm program costs in the United States and other grain exporting nations. In 1986 the United States spent $25.6 billion in farm program payments. The European Economic Community spent $25 billion. Although 1988 U.S. farm program costs dropped to approximately $14 billion, the budget deficit crisis compels exploration of new ways to raise grain prices and thus reduce the need for government payments.

Soil erosion, a serious worldwide environmental problem, would also be mitigated by an international land conservation agreement. Approximately one-fifth of the world's cropland is experiencing an intolerable rate of soil erosion. Millions of acres of cropland are lost annually to severe soil erosion, and the productivity of millions of additional acres continues to deteriorate. All nations have land under cultivation that never should have been plowed or cleared of trees. A 10-year conservation reserve program would make great strides in the control of global soil erosion. the environmental benefits from such a program would help to assure future generations an adequate number of productive acres and an adequate food supply.

In conclusion, current farm policies throughout the world continue to encourage farmers through subsidies to deplete valuable soil resources to grow crops already in surplus. Farmers and taxpayers of grain exporting nations in effect are subsidizing food importing nations. So long as world grain stocks remain at excessive levels, farm prices will remain depressed and farm program costs will be a subject of concern. An international agricultural conservation reserve program is the only effective means of reducing grain production and increasing farm prices. I ask my colleagues to join in support of this concurrent resolution to urge the administration to initiate multilateral negotiations of an international agricultural conservation agreement.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 9—PROVIDING FOR EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN LEGISLATION

Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. COATS) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, was referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on governmental Affairs:

S. CON. RES. 9

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (a) if the President, within three calendar days (excluding Sundays) of the time the President approves any appropriation bill, transmits to both Houses of the Congress, one or more special messages in accordance with subsection (b) proposing to rescind all or part of any items of appropriation provided in the appropriation bill, such special messages shall be considered in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

(b)(1) Each special message transmitted under subsection (a) shall specify, with respect to each item of appropriation (or part thereof) proposed by the message to be rescinded, the matters referred to in paragraphs (1) through (5) of section 1012(a) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 683(a)).

(2) Each special message transmitted under subsection (a) shall be accompanied by a draft bill or joint resolution that would, if enacted, rescind each item of appropriation (or part thereof) proposed by the message to be rescinded.

(3)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the President may transmit one special message under subsection (a) with respect to each agency for which an appropriation bill appropriates or otherwise makes funds available. A special message may propose to rescind one or more items of appropriation with respect to the agency to which it relates.

(B)(i) For purposes of subparagraph (A), except as provided in clause (ii), the term "agency" means—

(I) any Executive department (as defined in section 101 of title 5, United States Code), and

(II) any independent establishment (as defined in section 104 of title 5, United States Code), of the United States Government.

(ii) The President shall incorporate in a single special message all rescissions proposed with respect to any independent establishment—

(I) for which an appropriation bill appropriates or otherwise makes funds available, and

(II) for which the total amount appropriated or otherwise made available for the fiscal year immediately preceding the fiscal year in which the special message is transmitted was less than $100,000,000.

For purposes of subclause (II) of this clause, the total amount appropriated for an independent establishment for a fiscal year shall be determined without regard to any rescission or deferral under this section or under the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, and without regard to any reduction or sequestration under section 252 of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985.

(c)(1)(A) On the day on which a special message proposing to rescind an item of appropriation is transmitted to the House of Representatives and the Senate under subsection (a), the draft bill or joint resolution accompanying such special message shall be introduced (by request) in the House by the majority leader of the House, for himself and the minority leader of the House, or by the Members of the House designated by the majority leader and the minority leader of the House, and shall be introduced (by request) in the Senate by the majority leader of the Senate, for himself and the minority leader of the Senate, or by the Members of the Senate designated by the majority leader and the minority leader of the Senate. If either House is not in session on the day on which a special message is transmitted, the draft bill or joint resolution shall be introduced in that House, as provided in the preceding sentence, on the first day thereafter on which such House is in session.

(B) A bill or joint resolution introduced in the House of Representatives or the Senate pursuant to subparagraph (A) shall be referred on the date of introduction to the Committee on Appropriations of such House. The committee shall report the bill or joint resolution without substantive revision (and with or without recommendation) not later than 5 calendar days of continuous session of the Congress after the date on which the bill or joint resolution is introduced. A committee failing to report a bill or joint resolution within the 5-day period referred to in the preceding sentence shall be automatically discharged from consideration of the bill or joint resolution, and the bill or joint resolution shall be placed on the appropriate calendar.

(C)(i) A vote on final passage of a bill or joint resolution introduced in a House of the Congress pursuant to subparagraph (A) shall be taken on or before the close of the 10th calendar day of continuous session of the Congress after the date of the introduction of the bill or joint resolution in such House. If the bill or joint resolution is agreed to, the Clerk of the House of Representatives (in the case of a bill or joint resolution agreed to in the House of Representatives) or the Secretary of the Senate (in the case of a bill or joint resolution agreed to in the Senate) shall cause the bill or joint resolution to be engrossed, certified, and transmitted to the other House of the Congress on the same calendar day on which the bill or joint resolution is agreed to by such House.

(ii) Notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution, after the 10th calendar day of continuous session of the Congress after the date of the introduction of a bill or joint resolution pursuant to subparagraph (A), it is in order (even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to) for any Member of the respective House to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill or joint resolution (but only on the day after the calendar day on which such Member announces to the house concerned the Member's intention to do so). All points of order against the bill or joint resolution (and against consideration of the bill or joint resolution) are waived. The motion is highly privileged in the House of Representatives and is privileged in the Senate and is not debatable. The motion is not subject to amendment, or to a motion to postpone, or to a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to shall not be in order. If a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill or joint resolution is agreed to, the respective House shall immediately proceed to consideration of the bill or joint resolution without intervening motion, order, or other business, and the bill or joint resolution shall remain the unfinished business of the respective House until disposed of.

(2) If prior to the passage by one House of a bill or joint resolution introduced in that House under this section, that House receives a bill or joint resolution containing the same provisions from the other House pursuant to subparagraph (C) of paragraph (1), then—

(A) the procedure in the House receiving the bill or joint resolution with respect to the bill or joint resolution introduced in that House shall be the same as if the bill or joint resolution had not been received from the other House; but

(B) the vote on final passage shall be on the bill or joint resolution of the other House.

(3)(A) A motion in the House of Representatives to proceed to the consideration of a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be highly privileged and not debatable. An amendment to the motion shall not be in order, nor shall it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(B) Debate in the House of Representatives on a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be limited to not more than 4 hours, which shall be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the bill or joint resolution. A motion to postpone, made in the House of Representatives with respect to the consideration of a bill or joint resolution under this section, and a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business, shall not be in order. A motion further to limit debate shall not be debatable. It shall not be in order to move to table or to recommit a bill or joint resolution under this section or to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill or joint resolution is agreed to or disagreed to.

(C) All appeals from the decisions of the Chair relating to the application of the Rules of the House of Representatives to the procedure relating to a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be decided without debate.

(D) Except to the extent specifically provided in the preceding provisions of this paragraph, consideration of a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be governed by the Rules of the House of Representatives applicable to other bills and joint resolutions in similar circumstances.

(4)(A) A motion in the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be privileged and not debatable. An amendment to the motion shall not be in order, nor shall it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(B) Debate in the Senate on a bill or joint resolution under this section, and all debatable motions and appeals in connection therewith, shall be limited to not more than 4 hours. The time shall be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and the minority leader or their designees.

(C) Debate in the Senate on any debatable motion or appeal in connection with a bill or joint resolution under this section shall be limited to not more than 1 hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the bill or joint resolution, except that in the event the manager of the bill or joint resolution is in favor of any such motion or appeal, the time in opposition thereto, shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from time under their control on the passage of a bill or joint resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any debatable motion or appeal.

(D) A motion in the Senate to further limit debate on a bill or joint resolution under this section is not debatable. A motion to table or to recommit a bill or joint resolution under this section is not in order.

(d) No amendment to a bill or joint resolution considered under this section shall be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate. No motion to suspend the application of this subsection shall be in order in either House, nor shall it be in order in either House for the Presiding Officer to entertain a request to suspend the application of this subsection by unanimous consent.

(e) For purposes of this section—

(1) "item of appropriation" means any numerically expressed amount of budget authority set forth in an appropriation bill;

(2) "appropriation bill" means any general or special appropriation bill, and any bill or joint resolution making supplemental, deficiency, or continuing appropriations;

(3) "appropriation Act" means any appropriation bill that has been approved by the President and become law;

(4) "budget authority" has the meaning given to such term in section 3(2) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 622(2)); and

(5) continuity of a session of the Congress shall be considered as broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the 5-day and 10-day periods referred to in subsection (c) of this section. If a special message is transmitted under this section during any Congress and the last session of the Congress adjourns sine die before the expiration of 10 calendar days of continuous session (or a special message is transmitted after the last session of the Congress adjourns sine die), the message shall be deemed to have been retransmitted on the first day of the succeeding Congress and the 5-day and 10-day periods referred to in subsection (c) of this section shall commence on the day after such first day.

(f) The provisions of this section are enacted by the Congress—

(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply, and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to such House) at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am introducing a concurrent resolution which will provide for expedited consideration of Presidential rescission messages.

This measure was first proposed by Vice President Quayle in 1987. It has since been endorsed by Presidents Reagan and Ford as well as former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker. In addition, the proposal has been recommended by President Reagan in his last three budget messages to the Congress.

My intent in introducing this measure is simple: I am seeking to strengthen what has heretofore been a toothless tiger—the Presidential rescission. Under the current system, Congress must approve a President's rescission message within 45 days of its transmittal. Absent affirmative action by the Congress on the rescission, the President is obligated to spend the funds. In other words, through sheer inaction, Congress forces the President to make expenditures which he has deemed inappropriate, unnecessary or wasteful.

Under the enhanced rescission proposal, Congress would be required to vote on proposed rescissions. The President would transmit to Congress one rescission message per department or agency of government funded by an appropriations bill within 3 days of signing the spending measure into law. The Appropriations Committee must report the rescission—without amendment—within 5 days or be discharged from further consideration. The full Senate and House must vote on it within 10 calendar days. The point is to provide a means for Congress to address directly proposed rescissions.

This is a modest proposal, all the more so when one considers the historical relationship between Congress and the President on spending matters. It is important to remember that it was only with the enactment of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974 that the President was denied the authority to actually withhold the expenditure of congressionally appropriated funds.

Thomas Jefferson was the first President to impound funds—$50,000 for Navy gunboats. Franklin Roosevelt impounded $500 million Congress appropriated for public works projects. Presidents Kennedy and Johnson reduced spending by over 5 percent through impoundments.

The Budget Act replaced the President's impoundment powers with the rescission process. Predictably, the record of Congress in acting on proposed rescissions is hardly impressive.

President Reagan proposed over $43 billion in rescissions during his 8 years in office; only $16 billion was accepted—virtually the entire amount occurred during his first year in office. From 1983 to 1988 President Reagan requested $20 billion in rescissions; Congress accepted 2 percent—only $400 million in 5 years.

In sum, the enhanced rescission proposal will open a small window of congressional accountability on spending which the President has deemed unnecessary. In essence, we are simply asking the Congress to dispose of the matter directly through a "yea" or "nay" vote under certain expedited procedures. It is a reasonable step toward fiscal accountability.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 9—RELATING TO SENSE OF THE SENATE OR CONGRESS AMENDMENTS

Mr. MITCHELL (for Mr. PRYOR, for himself and Mr. MITCHELL) submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie over under the rules:

S. RES. 9

Resolved, That rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"6. On a point of order made by any Senator, no amendment expressing the sense of the Senate or the sense of the Congress, or an amendment to such amendment, shall be received unless the amendment is signed by at least twenty Senators.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 10—RELATIVE TO A 15 MINUTE LIMIT ON ROLL CALL VOTES

Mr. MITCHELL (for Mr. PRYOR, for himself and Mr. MITCHELL) submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie over under the rules:

S. RES. 10

Resolved, That (a) paragraph 1 of rule XII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding after the first sentence the following: "No roll call vote shall exceed 15 minutes in duration. When 15 minutes have elapsed from the beginning of any roll call the Presiding Officer shall ask if there are any other Senators in the Senate chamber wishing to vote or change their votes. If no Senator answers, the Presiding Officer shall announce the decision and the question shall be decided.".

(b) In order to implement the amendment made by subsection (a), the Committee on Rules and Administration shall establish a system in the Senate chamber to signal the expiration of 15 minutes from the beginning of a roll call vote.

SENATE RESOLUTION 11—RELATIVE TO THE GERMANENESS AND RELEVANCY OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. MITCHELL (for Mr. BYRD) submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie over under the rule:

S. RES. 11

Resolved, That rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(1) by inserting after "MOTIONS" in the caption a semicolon and the following: "GERMANENESS";

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"6. (a) At any time during the consideration of a bill or resolution, it shall twice be in order during a calendar day to move that no amendment, other than the reported committee amendments, which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution or to the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall thereafter be in order. The motion shall be priviledged and shall be decided after one hour of debate, without any intervening action, to be equally divided and controlled by the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader or their designees.

"(b) If a motion made under subparagraph (a) is agreed to by an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the Senators present and voting, then any floor amendment not already agreed to (except amendments proposed by the Committee which reported the bill or resolution) which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution, or the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the Committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall not be in order.

"(c) When a motion made under subparagraph (a) has been agreed to as provided in subparagraph (b) with respect to a bill or resolution, points of order with respect to questions of germaneness or relevancy of amendments shall be decided without debate, except that the Presiding Officer may entertain debate for his own guidance prior to ruling on the point of order. Appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer on such points of order shall be decided without debate.

"(d) Whenever an appeal is taken from a decision of the Presiding Officer on the question of germaneness of an amendment, or whenever the Presiding Officer submits the question of germaneness or relevancy of an amendment to the Senate, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer or hold the amendment germane or relevant shall be three-fifths of the Senators present and voting. No amendment proposing sense of the Senate or sense of the Congress language that does not directly relate to the measure or matter before the Senate shall be considered germane.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 12—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURES BY THE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

SENATE RESOLUTION 13—IMPLEMENTING CLOSED CAPTIONED BROADCASTS OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, AND Mr. HATCH) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That subsection (a) of the first section of Senate Resolution 28, agreed to February 27, 1986, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "All coverage under this resolution shall be made available to hearing-impaired individuals via closed captions.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I am submitting a resolution which will enable millions of Americans with hearing impairments to tune in to their democracy by requiring closed-captioned broadcasting of Senate floor proceedings. I am very pleased to have the majority leader join me in introducing this resolution, as well as Senators MCCAIN, HARKIN, WILSON, LEAHY, DURENBERGER, DANFORTH, MURKOWSKI, BOSCHWITZ, HATCH, and JEFFORDS. The proposal is identical to one I sponsored last year with several of my colleagues who are joining me today.

Closed-captioned broadcasting allows the audio portion of a program to be displayed in printed form on the television screen. The captions are only received if a person has a special decoding device attached to a televison set.

There is no technological reason why captioning cannot be used to expand the viewing audience of the Senate to include our deaf and hearing-impaired citizens. Real-time, instantaneous captioning has been available since 1982 and is now used in broadcasts of Presidential speeches and press conferences, news and public affairs programs, and even some Senate committee hearings. The House of Representatives also recently approved a proposal to require captioning of its televised proceedings. There would of course be some cost involved in providing this service for the Senate, but I believe it is a small price to pay to make this body accessible to all Americans.

The proposal I am introducing today simply amends the resolution setting forth the rules regarding televising of Senate sessions. It does not specify what type of equipment should be used or whether the captioning should be done in-house or by a commercial service. These and other practical details of implementing the resolution would be worked out by the Senate Rules Committee, which has been exploring the various options for several years.

All the major organizations representing Americans with hearing impairments support closed-captioning Senate proceedings—and for good reason. They recognize that the knowledge gained from observing the legislative process in action makes for a more informed and involved citizenry. And they believe, as I do, that as citizens and taxpayers, hearing-impaired Americans are as entitled to witness the debates of their elected representatives as their fellow Americans who can hear.

Mr. President, we began our experiment with television in the Senate because we believed that the more people participate in our democracy, the stronger it becomes. Our viewers may not always be impressed or entertained by what they see. But they at least have the opportunity to judge for themselves whether they are being well-served by their elected leaders. It is time to extend that opportunity—and right—to the more than 20 million Americans who are deaf or hearing-impaired.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, since television came to the Senate in 1986, I have been working to close caption our floor proceedings. As chairman of the Subcommittee on the Handicapped, and as the brother of a deaf sibling, this subject is of very special importance to me. Today, the distinguished majority and minority leaders have introduced a resolution, which, when adopted, will change the rules of the Senate and allow its proceedings to be closed captioned. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this resolution.

Since coming to Congress in 1975, I have initiated and fought for public policies that improve access for Americans who are deaf and hard of hearing. Congress has made considerable progress in this area over the years.

In 1975, Congress established the National Captioning Institute [NCI], and funded the development of decoders.

In 1976, Congress directed the Federal Communications Commission to require television stations to transmit all emergency warnings visually as well as aurally. In addition, the Public Broadcasting Service requested permanent approval of transmission standards for closed captioning.

Also in that year, deaf Americans were provided access to the televised president debates between President Gerald Ford and Governor Jimmy Carter. PBS provided a sign language interpreter for the debates, and later rebroadcasted them with captions.

In the following years, telecommunication devices for the deaf [TDD's] were brought to Capitol Hill and network television was encouraged to close caption more of its programming.

During the 100th Congress, the Senate Rules Committee convened a task force to study the feasibility of close captioning Senate floor proceeding. In 1987, I testified before the Rules Committee, to reaffirm my support and dedication to closed captioning Senate proceedings.

Last year, I held a hearing in conjunction with the release of the Commission on the Education of the Deaf's report. This Commission, created by Public Law 99-371, the Education of the Deaf Act, was established to examine the status of deaf education in this country and to make recommendations on possible improvements within the system.

In this report, the Commission examined prevention and early identification of deafness, elementary and secondary education, Federal postsecondary education systems, research, evaluation and outreach, professional standards and training, and technology. The Commission found that the status of deaf education in this country is unsatisfactory and that "Maintenance of the status quo represents an unwarranted extravagance—especially when we consider that a clearer understanding of the needs of persons who are deaf, coupled with the redirection of some existing funding and priorities, and a modest amount of new funding could result in impressive long-term savings." [p. ix]

In this comprehensive study, the Commission identifies captioning of television as one of the most important technologies for deaf and hearing impaired individuals. The report states, "The deficiencies, referred to earlier, in the successful implementation of publicly stated and legislated policy, lie largely in the failure to [among other things] use, and encourage the use of, the diverse tools being provided by advancing technology, including computers, and electronic equipment and support for TV closed captioning." [p. X]

The Commission also finds that closed captioning is the most effective technology for speeding the attainment of literacy, and more importantly, in helping the deaf person participate in the wider world that is routinely accessible to those who hear. I subscribe to this view.

"TV is the most prevasive and influential means of sharing information in America. Until the 1970's, deaf persons had no access to TV, and were isolated from the major pipeline feeding information to America. The development of captioning made it possible for deaf persons to see what others heard on TV." [p. 112]

It is also important to note that closed captioned television can benefit more than just the deaf and hearing impaired population. It can help hearing children and illiterate adults learn to read. Captioning can also facilitate the acquisition of the English language by those whose first language is not English.

Mr. President, one of the most disturbing findings of the Commission is that some 70 percent of all deaf high school graduates read at the third grade level. This is partially due to the difficulty in recognizing and accommodating the special communication needs of deaf children. These children have have an invisible language disability and oftentimes cannot understand what is being taught. Closed captioning provides visible access to the English language, and facilitates language acquisition which in turn facilitates learning.

There are approximately 22 million Americans who experience partial or total loss of hearing and who stand to benefit from close captioned proceedings. Of that number, 2 million are totally deaf; the other 20 million have varying degrees of hearing loss. As Americans live longer, the number of people with hearing impairments will increase.

Mr. President, as I said in my testimony before the Rules Committee, "we have decided that it is important that we be accountable to our constituents and that they have the opportunity to partake in the legislative process via television. It is no less important that deaf and hard of hearing Americans be afforded that same opportunity."

In sum, Mr. President, we should send the message to the public and to the networks that to us, captioning is routine. As a cosponsor of this resolution, I thank the majority and minority leaders for bringing this proposal before the Senate and I urge its immediate adoption.

SENATE RESOLUTION 14—RELATIVE TO THE BAN ON THE IMPORTATION OF U.S. BEEF BY THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. PRESSLER, and Mr. EXON) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 14

Whereas an open and fair system of trade is a cornerstone of the relationship between the United States and the European Community;

Whereas the European Community on January 1, 1989 implemented a ban on all meat treated with growth hormones;

Whereas this action has damaged the domestic beef industry by bringing back to life myths and untruths about American beef;

Whereas the European Community has refused to submit the issue for resolution to a scientific dispute settlement panel under the Standards Code of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade of which both the United States and European Community are signatories;

Whereas the European Community's claim that the animal hormone ban is based on health conerns; and the European Community has not submitted evidence that demonstrates that proper application of growth hormones is unsafe for human consumption;

Whereas the U.S Food and Drug Administration's view parallels that of prestigious panel of international scientific experts, within the Codex Alimentarius Commission of the United Nation's Food and Agriculture Organization that concluded that correct use of the hormones being banned by the European Community poses no health hazards;

Whereas the United States, in the face of such unwarranted and unfair trade practices by the European Community, justifably imposed trade sanctions worth approximately $100 million in an amount equal to that of the European Community ban;

Whereas the European Community has threatened new sanctions by imposing a ban on American walnuts and dried fruits worth an estimated $97 million in U.S. trade: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States recognizing the urgent need to respond to this unprovoked action by the European Community supports the efforts of the President and the U.S. Trade Representative to resolve this dispute. The Senate encourages any and all measures deemed necessary, including requiring the United States Secretary of Defense to order all United States Commissaries and their dependencies in the European Community to buy and sell only U.S. meat and meat products if the European Community implements any counter-retaliatory trade sanctions against the United States. If implemented, these measures should remain in force until such time as the European Community's ban is either rescinded or a negotiated solution is reached.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States opposes any and all unfair trade restrictions on U.S. meat by the European Community. The Senate of the United States regrets that the actions of the European Community against the United States have made retaliation necessary to protect America's vital trade interests. The Senate calls on the European Community to cease its actions and to commence negotiations with the United States to resolve this dispute in a manner befitting the longstanding bonds of mutual friendship and cooperation of these nations.

Resolved futher, That a copy of this resolution will be sent to the President of the United States.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, over 1 year ago the European Community announced it would impose a trade ban on American beef and beef by-products treated with growth hormones. On January 1, 1989, the Europeans implemented that ban.

This is a ban on beef raised in most of America.

Frankly, I don't understand why the Europeans would do this. American beef is some of the best "good eating" that anyone can enjoy and it provides significant nutritional value. I have difficulty understanding why Europeans would want to banish from their dinner tables American-bred steaks, prime rib, burgers, and roasts.

The European Community's political decision was not only dumb, but it is also an unfair trade practice against the United States that prompted President Reagan to retaliate against the EC's ban.

Since that time the European Community has announced further trade measures against the United States. They have threatened to impose an additional $97 million in tariffs on American walnuts and dried fruits.

At a meeting of the EC Foreign Ministers 2 days ago, they decided to postpone a decision on escalating this beef war. They will meet again to review the situation on February 20.

I am pleased to hear that the European Community is showing signs of coming to its senses and coming to the negotiating table. Nobody, least of all tis Senator, wants a drawn out agricultural trade war.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the well respected United Nations' Food and Agriculture Organization have concluded that correct use of the hormones banned by the European Community poses no health hazard.

Instead of vollying allegations back and forth, why not let an impartial scientific panel of experts under the Standards Code of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade make an objective decision? Our Trade Representative has been trying to get the European Community to agree to it, but they have refused.

My good friends Senator WALLOP, Senator BAUCUS and other Senators who are cosponsoring this resolution believe that all parties must work quickly to resolve the beef dispute. I am encouraged by the latest action by the EC.

But, if the EC proves headstrong and implements their latest proposed ban on walnuts and dried fruit, we should be prepared to refocus the beef war on beef and retaliate.

Today, we are introducing a resolution that would call on the President of the United States and the Secretary of Defense to require that U.S. Commissaries in the European Community buy and sell only American meat.

Presently, our Armed Forces in Europe are served only American meat in their mess halls. This resolution would extend that practice to the Commissaries as well, to the tune of $40 to $50 million annually.

This measure would be permitted under the recently enacted Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. It is also legal under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

In my own State of New Mexico, in 1987 over $653.9 million of cash receipts were generated by cattle and calves. That means that over 55 percent of total agricultural cash receipts came from cattle, and three-quarters of our agriculture is cattle based.

Mr. President, Senator WALLOP and I are confident that the recovery we have experienced in agricultural exports with a gain of over $7.6 billion in fiscal year 1988 will continue if we send our trading partners the right signals. One of those signals is that we are ready to trade fairly and openly if others do the same.

We are also prepared to demand fairness when our trading partners pursue unfair trade practices.

I ask your support in signaling our commitment, and ask that the current resolution receive the widespread support our cattlemen expect, and our beef industry deserves.

Mr. President, I ask that an article by Senator Baucus be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Journal of Commerce, Jan. 25, 1989]

STANDING TALL IN HORMONE WAR

(By Max Baucus)

The current trade dispute between the United States and the European Community over the EC's ban on imports of meat from animals given growth homones continues to escalate.

The United States retaliated against the community's homone ban on Jan. 1 by blocking $100 million in EC exports to the United States. The community struck back this week when it announced that it plans to counter-retaliate against $100 million worth of U.S. exports on Feb. 20.

The community's threat of counter-retaliation already has sparked widespread calls for the United States to reconsider its position and lift its retaliation. If the counter-retaliation goes forward, these calls doubtless will intensify.

Lifting the retaliation would be a very serious mistake. No one wants to set off a trade war, but this dispute is a critical test of U.S. resolve. If the United States blinks now, it will soon face new trade barriers in Europe and around the world.

The European Community decided to impose the ban ostensibly in response to consumer demands for hormone-free meat. But the ban is nothing more than a smoke screen, a cynical strategy to play upon the public's concern about health while hiding the true intentions of European trade officials. There is simply no scientific basis for Europe's claim that the use of growth hormones by the American meat industry poses any threat to human health.

A number of highly respected scientific bodies, including an arm of the United Nations, have concluded that the low dosages administered by U.S. farmers are completely safe. Europe's refusal to allow an impartial international panel to review the scientific basis for the ban is clear evidence that it is just another brick in the highly protectionist wall Europe has erected around its agricultural sector.

The community's Common Agricultural Policy may be the world's single largest trade barrier. Since the policy came into existence, Europe has effectively banned imports of most agricultural commodities and subsidized its way from being the world's largest agricultural importer to being the world's largest exporter. In total, the community's agricultural policy already may have cost American farmers upwards of $150 billion in lost exports. The hormone ban alone will cost the United States $100 million a year directly in lost exports.

The implications of this new trade barrier reach far beyond U.S. meat exports. Unchallenged, the hormone ban would stand as an invitation to other nations to block American agricultural goods under the guise of health and safety restrictions. The Japanese could easily follow suit and impose similar restrictions on our beef exports to Japan. Other nations could formulate import restrictions related to pesticides or fungicides that would hurt American grain, vegetable and fruit exports. Such trade restrictions would have serious consequences for our economy.

American agriculture is our best export performer. At a time when the United States faces massive trade deficits, we can ill afford to open the door to a whole new set of restrictions on our agricultural exports.

In addition, this trade dispute affects more than just agriculture. As the community goes forward with its Europe 1992 economic unification, there will be a strong temptation to raise new barriers against exports to Europe. Continued economic growth in our country depends on increasing exports.

With the EC the world's largest market, we simply cannot afford to stand idly by when Europe raises new barriers to our products. If we allow Brussels to get away with the hormone ban, we undoubtedly would see a whole series of new restrictions on other U.S. exports to Europe in coming years.

Trade retaliation is always nasty and dangerous business; the United States must not go looking to pick a trade war, but inaction now courts greater trade problems in the future. The hormone ban is simple protectionism. If the United States is going to support free trade, we must stick to our guns—even if that means still another wave of retaliation and counter-retaliation with Europe. We simply cannot afford to back down.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to join my fellow colleagues in offering this resolution today to emphatically state our resolve that the United States will not stand for, will not tolerate, and will fight against any and all unfair trade sanctions implemented against it under the guise of health or any other false pretense.

The reason for our frustration is obvious: there is no logical or scientifically supported reason behind the European Community's ban of U.S. imported beef. Scientific panels around the world have supported the United States in our determination that the proper use of certain hormones pose no health hazard. Yet, the EC continues its politically motivated directive of banning beef treated with hormones. The line must be drawn. We cannot allow our European trading partners to send out the message that we are vulnerable to their protectionist efforts.

I strongly supported the USTR's decision on January 1, 1989, to retaliate against the EC's unfair trade practice and place a 100-percent ad valorem tariff on a number of EC goods entering the United States. This increase in revenue will supplement the approximate $100 million in revenue lost due to the reduction of beef exports. As well, I feel it vital that the U.S. Senate, which was not in session when this directive went into effect and was, therefore, unable to respond immediately to the actions of the EC, speak loudly on this issue of unfair trade barriers and send a strong message to our trading partners that we will not acquiesce in our effort to fight the battle against unfair trade practices.

Along with supporting any and all efforts by the USTR to end this trade dispute, it is my contention that the Senate should support, upon the counter retaliation by the EC, the order as outlined in the resolution that all U.S. commissaries and their dependencies in the European Community buy and sell only U.S. meat and meat products. While not supporting rigid buy American initiatives, I do, however, believe in this instance that we cannot allow the EC to unfairly ban U.S. beef and subsequently allow our European commissaries to continue to support the EC's domestic cattle industry.

Mr. President, as a cofounder of the Senate Beef Caucus and a Senator from a beef producing State, I strongly believe cattle producers across the United States should have free access to the many beef markets around the world. We have made great strides in our attempt to reduce the friction in our relations with our trading partners caused by unduly trade restriction and barriers. We are not going to allow these unfair actions by the EC to undermine the progress we have made and set us back in our efforts to break down archaic trade barriers that still exist.

However, as our efforts to promote a freer and more unrestricted trading relationship with the countries of the world progress, the United States cannot allow those doors to close at the unsubstantiated whim of the host nation. The 1985 directive passed by the EC is exactly that—the closing of a $100 million market to U.S. beef producers and a dangerous precedent for the United States to allow. The EC continues to claim that the animal hormone ban is based on health concerns, yet scientific evidence does not support these claims. Scientific research and data produced by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration as well as other prestigious international scientific panels have shown no deleterious effect or residue when growth hormones were used as a means to produce larger and leaner cattle at a lower cost.

Mr. President, there is simply no justification for the European Community to have initiated such a protectionist, unfair, and unsubstantiated trade restriction. it is our obligation to break through this newly constructed barrier and send a powerful and potent message to the European Community about the United States's distaste for their actions. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution deploring the European Community ban of U.S. beef and the retaliatory measure contained within.

SENATE RESOLUTION 15—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURES BY THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. PELL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 15

(b) For the period March 1, 1990, through February 28, 1991, expenses of the committee under this resolution shall not exceed $2,721,004, of which amount not to exceed $45,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended).

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later that February 28, 1990, and February 28, 1991, respectively.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries of employees paid at an annual rate, the payment of long distance telephone calls, or for the payment of stationery supplies purchased through the Keeper of the Stationery, U.S. Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 16—RELATIVE TO FUTURE FUNDING OF THE MUNICIPAL SEWAGE TREATMENT PROGRAM

Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. WILSON, Mr. PELL, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. REID, Mr. FORD, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. COHEN, Mr. KERRY, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. GORE, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. DASCHLE) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

S. RES. 16

Whereas clean water is a vital resource deserving the most rigorous protection;

Whereas a key component in protecting the Nation's oceans, rivers, lakes, and other waterways is Federal funding for the construction of sewage treatment plants as provided through the Construction Grants and State Revolving Loan Fund Programs of the Clean Water Act;

Whereas the unmet national need for sewage treatment construction has been estimated to be $76,000,000,000;

Whereas Congress, in enacting the Water Quality Act of 1987, authorized $2,400,000,000 for the Construction Grants and State Revolving Loan Fund Programs in fiscal year 1990;

Whereas the amount authorized by Congress is a just and prudent downpayment on a large national need;

Whereas the President's proposed 1990 budget unjustifiably would reduce the $2,400,000,000 that is authorized for the Construction Grants and State Revolving Loan Fund Programs by $1,200,000,000 in budget authority;

Whereas the One Hundredth Congress, by overriding the President's veto of the Water Quality Act of 1987, rejected the President's earlier attempt to amend and further reduce funding for the construction of municipal sewage treatment plants;

Whereas the State Revolving Loan Fund Program authorized in the Water Quality Act of 1987 will assure an orderly and appropriate transition from the Construction Grants Program;

Whereas tampering with the approach to municipal sewage treatment plant funding, which was enacted by Congress with the support of the American people and through an override of the President's unwise veto, would have a disruptive and negative effect on implementation of the law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the United States Senate that the President's 1990 budget proposals for municipal sewage treatment funding be soundly rejected, and that Congress through the budget and appropriations process assure the appropriation of the amount authorized for the program by the Water Quality Act of 1987, and further assure that such funds are spent in compliance with the spirit and the letter of the law.

SEC. 2. The Clerk of the United States Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President with the request that the President further transmit a copy to the Administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I am joined by Senators BURDICK, MOYNIHAN, BAUCUS, GRAHAM, LIEBERMAN, and others in introducing a sense of the Senate resolution urging the Senate to reject the proposed cut in sewage treatment construction funding. This resolution is virtually identical to one we introduced last year. That resolution, which had 54 cosponsors, passed the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

President Reagan's budget would unjustifiably cut $1.2 billion or 50 percent from the $2.4 billion that is authorized for sewage construction funding to States under the Clean Water Act. This act was reauthorized in February 1987 over the President's veto which was based largely on the administration's opposition to sewage treatment funding. It is $750 million less than appropriated by the Congress for fiscal year 1989.

The $2.4 billion authorized by Congress for fiscal year 1990 is part of a multiyear $18 billion package consisting of grants to construct sewage treatment facilities and grants to States to capitalize State revolving loan funds. These State funds are designed to provide a self-sustaining source of funding for sewage treatment facilities.

It is important to note that the Clean Water Act provides for an orderly phaseout of sewage treatment funding by 1994. So this program reflects budget realities.

Properly running sewage treatment plants are a key component in the Nation's effort to protect its coastal waters, rivers, and lakes. But according to EPA, the unmet national need for sewage treatment is $76 billion. New Jersey alone has a need of over $3 billion. The amount authorized by Congress is a just and prudent downpayment on this large national need.

Tampering with the congressionally authorized program will have a disruptive and negative effect on implementation of the Clean Water Act. It would be a severe blow to New Jersey and the Nation as we push to clean up our oceans, rivers, lakes, and coastal areas. This country must turn the tide on water pollution. We must move forward to stem the ravages of beach closings, not turn our backs on our environment and coastal economies.

The sewage treatment budget cut was included in President Reagan's final budget request. President Bush will be proposing adjustments to the Reagan budget. It is essential that he provide full funding for the construction grants and State revolving loan programs as authorized by the Congress. This resolution is designed to send a clear message to President Bush that the Senate will not support the Reagan budget request for sewage construction funding.

During the recent Presidential campaign, President Bush told the Nation that he was an enviromentalist and that he supported increased funding for environmental programs. And of critical importance to my State, President Bush came to the New Jersey shore and saw first hand the effect that polluted water and despoiled beaches can have on our economy and the welfare of our citizens. He called pollution at the shore a national tragedy and promised to act to stop the pollution. It is imperative that the President, who now has his own opportunity to propose budget priorities, not turn his back on all of us who live, work, and visit coastal areas like the shore for recreation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I sent President Bush a few weeks ago be inserted at the conclusion of my statement.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, January 9, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President-Elect of the United States,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PRESIDENT-ELECT BUSH: I am writing to urge you to reconsider President Reagan's budget proposal to cut funds for sewage treatment facilities construction by 50% from authorized levels.

During the Presidential campaign, you told the nation that you were an environmentalist. You said you wanted to provide increased funding for the environment. And you came to the New Jersey shore. You saw first hand that clean oceans and beaches are a vital national priority. And you saw the effect that polluted water and despoiled beaches can have on the economy of our country and the welfare of our citizens. You told New Jerseyans that pollution at the shore is a "national tragedy" and that you were going to clean up our coastal environment.

President Reagan's 1990 budget proposes to cut $1.2 billion from the sewage construction program Congress authorized in 1987. The construction of sewage treatment facilities is essential to our efforts to protect the nation's waterways, coastal areas and economies. The proposed funding reduction will hurt these efforts. The program Congress enacted provides states with funding to build these critically important sewage facilities while at the same time is sensitive to budgetary concerns by providing for a phase out of Federal funding.

In a few days, you will have the opportunity to correct this short-sighted proposal. You will decide whether to live up to your commitment to clean up our coastal environment or to turn your back on the citizens of New Jersey and the nation who have put their trust in you. You will find that those of us in the Congress are eager to work with you to clean up our coasts.

I urge you to fulfill your campaign promise to clean up our coastal environment. President Reagan's budget need not be the final word. Please give the shore a second by restoring full funding for the sewage treatment program.

Sincerely,

FRANK R. LAUTENBERG.

● Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, the resolution before us rejecting President Reagans fiscal year 1990 budget proposal for funds to construct sewage treatment plants is of importance to the nation, by home State of Connecticut, and to the fundamental implementation of the Clean Water Act Amendments passed in 1987.

Congress and this last administration have been struggling since 1985 to pass a comprehensive program to assure the citizens of this Nation of one of their most basic interests—clean water.

It has been estimated that the national need for sewage treatment construction funds is as high as $76 billion. For fiscal year 1990 Congress authorized $2.4 billion, a mere 3 percent of our overall national need. Yet the President, in his 1990 budget proposal, reduced the $2.4 billion by one-half, leaving us only $1.2 billion for the purpose of constructing sewage treatment plants, compared to the $76 billion need.

In Connecticut alone, this proposal represents a 38-percent cut in funding from the fiscal year 1989 level, and a 41-percent shortfall from the authorization set by the Water Quality Act of 1987. This will severely impede our ability to provide clean water for Connecticut residents. Connecticut's sewage treatment facilities require, according to State department of environmental protection data, $1.1 billion in modifications in order to bring them up to clean water standards. If

Long Island Sound, our rivers and our streams are going to be cleaned up, and if our beaches are going to be safe for swimming, we must invest more.

As attorney general of Connecticut, I sued towns and cities for pollution caused by antiquated sewage treatment plants. As a Senator, I want to do everything I can to help them make the changes we need to keep our water clean. That is why I support the resolution before us.●

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to join as an original cosponsor of this resolution expressing the Senate's support for full funding for the sewer grant program under the Clean Water Act.

It is important that the Federal Government maintain its end of the bargain we struck in the Clean Water Act amendments approved overwhelmingly at the start of the 100th Congress. At that time, we told the States that we would begin phasing out the Federal grant program, but before that process was completed we would help capitalize State revolving loan funds. This was a recognition of the enormity of the sewer problem facing towns and cities throughout the country, which the Environmental Protection Agency estimates will cost $76 billion to address. The $2.4 billion authorized for fiscal year 1990 in the Clean Water Act is but a small step toward the goal of clean water in every town in America.

In my home State of Maine, those towns still in need of complete sewer systems are mostly small, rural villages with no sewer system at all. They do not have the ability to raise the revenue needed to finance the installation of the necessary sewer equipment through local taxes, and they depend on the State and Federal Government to assist them in meeting the requirements of Federal law.

There are several other towns and cities in Maine in need of system upgrades or rerouted systems to prevent the disposal of sewage into lakes and rivers. This is a very serious problem in Maine that threatens to worsen as development pressures increase. It is crucial that we not renege on the commitment we made 2 years ago to assist local communities in meeting the demands of clean water regulations.

Clean water is a gift we tend to take for granted. The fragility of our water supply system is easily forgotten because clean water is so accessible. We drink it, we wash with it, we turn the faucet on and there it is.

We must remember, however, that the loss of a clean water system is something any one of us could experience one day. And so, we have made the commitment to ensure a steady supply of clean water and to enforce strict controls on pollution of our lakes, rivers and oceans. The continued construction of modern sewer systems is a crucial component of that effort, and the funding of the sewer grants program is essential to the fulfilment of our clean water goals.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of a Senate resolution which rejects the administration's 1990 fiscal year funding proposal for the Clean Water Act's construction grants program.

The Clean Water Act Amendments of 1987 authorized a multiyear $18 billion package consisting of construction grants, as well as funding for the gradual transition to the State revolving loan program. By overriding a Presidential veto on this act in 1987, Congress sent the administration a clear message: Federal assistance is desperately needed in cleaning up our Nation's water and in constructing and upgrading sewage treatment facilities. The need from the State's is great—EPA has estimated it to be about $76 billion.

I receive countless letters from municipalities in my State who are seeking assistance from the Federal government in upgrading their sewage treatment facilities. While some are able to receive assistance, there are many who do not.

Overwhelming congressional support for the Clean Water Act has apparently had no impact on the administration. The Clean Water Act authorized $2.4 billion for fiscal year 1990. The administration, however, has only proposed $1.2 billion. This request is also a large decrease from the $1.95 billion which was approved by Congress for fiscal year 1989.

This ridiculously low request is detrimental to the Nation, and is particularly devastating to my own State, New York. New York's share of construction grants funds is 11.16 percent. A $1.2 billion request will yield only $133.9 million to New York. This translates to a loss of $133 million in fiscal year 1990 alone. The congressionally authorized $2.4 billion will yield $267 million to New York.

This resolution is a strong statement of congressional support for the construction grants program. This program deserves its fully authorized amount $2.4 billion. I urge my colleagues to stand behind this resolution and work toward its swift passage.

Thank you, Mr. President.

SENATE RESOLUTION 17—TO AMEND THE STANDING RULES OF THE SENATE

Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. PRESSLEY, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. MCCAIN) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 17

Resolved, That rule XXXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no Senator or employee of the Senate may receive compensation from the Senate in excess of the maximum amount payable for such position on January 1, 1989, unless such increase has been affirmatively approved by a roll call vote of the Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 18—REQUIRING 2 DAYS NOTICE OF CONSIDERATION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

Mr. MCCLURE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 18

Resolved, That rule VIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding the following new paragraph:

"3. Except on unanimous consent, it shall not be in order to move to proceed to consideration of a bill or joint resolution or to request unanimous consent to proceed to consideration of a bill or joint resolution unless the Senator making such motion or request has caused his intention of making such motion or request to be announced on the floor on the second day of session preceding the day on which such motion or request is to be made. [If a Senator announces his intention of making such a motion or request and fails to make such motion or request on the appointed day, any other Senator may make such motion or request on that day; if no Senator makes such motion or request on that day, it shall not be in order, except on unanimous consent, for any Senator to announce his intention to make such a motion or request (with respect to the bill or joint resolution in question) until at least 5 calendar days thereafter.] The Chair shall enforce this paragraph on his own initiative and without any point of order being made by a Senator.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 19—SENSE OF SENATE RELATIVE TO PARTICIPATIVE MEMBERS OF THE PRESIDENT'S CABINET

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

S. RES. 19

Whereas Members of both Houses of Congress as well as members of both political parties supported the establishment of the Director of National Drug Control Policy as a position having "Cabinet rank";

Whereas the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-690) established the Director of National Drug Control Policy as a position on level with all Secretaries of United States Departments;

Whereas the legislative intent of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-690) clearly supports the establishment of such a position at the level of Cabinet rank;

Whereas the scourge of drugs continues to ravage the minds of the young, tear apart the fabric of the American family, deplete our Nation's talent pool, and our national treasury;

Whereas a positive signal to the Nation can be sent with the inclusion of the Director of National Drug Control Policy as a fully participative member of the President's Cabinet; and

Whereas to exclude the Director as a fully participative member of the President's Cabinet would not send the much needed signal to the Nation and to those who traffic in drugs of our seriousness in this fight on the war on drugs and drug abuse: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the United States Senate that the President of the United States recognize and include the Director of National Drug Control Policy as a fully participative member of the President's Cabinet.

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, today I am submitting a sense of the Senate resolution which urges the President to recognize and include the Director of National Drug Control Policy, commonly known as the "drug czar" as a fully participative member of the President's Cabinet. We need to send this signal to the Nation that we as a body and as a Government stand foursquare against the scourge of drugs.

The establishment of a Cabinet rank drug czar has its roots in the thousands of pages comprising the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. It is there, Mr. President, in the committee reports and legislative intent of the bill, that the expressed desire of Members on both sides of the aisle, and Members in both Houses of Congress, in fact, intended this position to have the same rank as the Secretaries of the Cabinet-level agencies. In other words, the drug czar would have the same rank as the Secretary of Defense, Secretary of Commerce, and Secretary of Labor. Those members understood quite clearly the importance that such a position and rank would have. It established a focal point for this Nation's various and important efforts in the constant war against the influx of drugs on our shores, in our cities and towns, and in our children's bodies.

The President himself spoke passionately throughout the fall campaign and thereafter of his steadfast commitment to eradicate drugs and drug abuse from the face of this country. He spoke of the goodness of the American people, their willingness to come together in times of crisis and work for the betterment of the Nation. Surely this is such a crisis.

The appointment of William Bennett as drug czar assured the Nation that the fight against drugs and drug abuse would remain a top priority. He and all of the citizens of this country believed that he would have the access to the President accorded other Cabinet members. It sent all the right signals, Mr. President. It was the proper way to go on this issue. I have to ask what the change of mind or attitude was.

It is my strong belief that the people of the United States, as well as the Members of this body, want this post to have Cabinet-level status. I therefore have submitted this sense of the Senate resolution urging President Bush to recognize and include the drug czar as a fully participative member of the Cabinet. To exclude the drug czar from the Cabinet table sends the wrong signals, when this country is longing for some right signals on this issue. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 20—RELATIVE TO THE PRESERVATION OF U.S. TERRITORY IN THE ARCTIC OCEAN

Mr. HELMS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations;

S. RES. 20

Whereas Wrangell Island became a part of the United States by right of confirmed discovery during the voyage of Captain Thomas Long, a citizen of the United States, of the barque Nile in 1867 and by right of first possession formalized during the voyage of Captain Calvin L. Hooper of the U.S. Revenue Marine steamer Corwin in 1881;

Whereas the Senate had printed a "Report of the U.S. Revenue Steamer Thomas Corwin, in the Arctic Ocean," as Ex. Doc. No. 204 in the 1st Session of the 48th Congress;

Whereas the House of Representatives had printed reports on the cruise of the United States Revenue Marine steamer Corwin in Alaska and the Northwest Arctic Ocean in the 2d Session of the 47th Congress, in the 1st Session of the 49th Congress, and in the 1st Session of the 50th Congress;

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America approved on March 18, 1878 an Act in aid of a Polar expedition designed by James Gordon Bennett, a citizen of the United States, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the vessel Jeannette, purchased in Great Britain;

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America approved on February 27, 1879 an Act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept and take charge of the ship Jeannette for the use of a North Polar Expedition;

Whereas Jeannette Island was discovered on May 16, 1881 and formally taken possession of on June 3, 1881 during the voyage of U.S. Navy Commander George Washington De Long on the Jeannette;

Whereas Henrietta Island was discovered on May 24, 1881 and formally taken possession of on June 3, 1881 during the voyage U.S. Navy Commander George Washington De Long on the Jeannette;

Whereas Bennett Island was discovered on July 11, 1881 and formally taken possession of on July 29, 1881 during the voyage of U.S. Navy Commander George Washington De Long on the Jeannette;

Whereas Wrangell, Herald, Jeannette, Henrietta, and Bennett islands were surveyed by the United States Navy for the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in 1881;

Whereas the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey placed Wrangell, Herald, Jeannette, Henrietta, and Bennett islands in the District of Alaska;

Whereas beginning in 1900 the United States Geological Survey included Wrangell, Herald, Jeannette, Henrietta, and Bennett islands as part of the District, later Territory, and State of Alaska; and

Whereas unlike the government of Canada and Great Britain, the Government of the United States has never surrendered its sovereignty over these islands; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That (a) it is the sense of the Senate that under the United States Constitution any territory, outercontinental shelf, exclusive economic zone, or fishery conservation zone, including the territory described in subsection (b), may only be transferred to any other country—

(1) by treaty in accordance with Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the United States Constitution which states that "[the President] shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; "; and

(2) by enactment of Congress in accordance with Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the United States Constitution which states that "[t]he Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.".

(b) The territory referred to in subsection (a) includes the island of Wrangell, Herald, Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette which are located in the Arctic Ocean and the outer continental shelf, of, and the exclusive economic zone surrounding, those islands.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am deeply concerned that the Department of State is endeavoring to turn over to the Soviet Union five U.S. islands in the Arctic Ocean. These islands are: Wrangell Islands, Herald Island, Jeannette Island, Henrietta Island, and Bennett Island.

There is far more at stake here than the ownership of five small islands covered with ice and snow. What is at stake is how, under the rules of international law, the United States will define its Outer Continental Shelf. If we surrender these islands we will be surrendering an area that amounts to almost half of our entire Outer Continental Shelf.

Moreover, these islands lie in the Arctic between the Soviet Union and the North Pole. If we surrender the islands to Soviet sovereignty we may well be surrendering control of the Arctic Ocean to Soviet nuclear submarines.

The State Department refers to this problem as a boundary dispute involving the 1867 Convention Line established with the purchase of Alaska. It is true that there are substantive issues involving the 1867 Convention Line in the Navarin Basin, south of the Bering Strait. These are questions which ought to be carefully studied, both by the administration and by the Senate.

But the islands are all north of the Bering Strait, in the Arctic Ocean, and deserve to be a focus of separate attention. A glance at the map will show that this is hardly a "boundary dispute," a term which might imply drawing a line 100 miles one way or another. This is a major issue, substantively different from the Navarin Basin problem, which could determine control of the Arctic Ocean for generations to come.

These islands are U.S. territory and property. They were discovered by U.S. citizens and taken possession of on behalf of the United States. The United States has asserted sovereignty over them. The U.S. Congress has acted upon them as our territory and property. Therefore, it is clear that, under the Constitution, they cannot be alienated by the State Department, without the express consent of both Houses of the U.S. Congress.

The resolution which I am submitting today expresses the sense of Congress that the provisions of the Constitution with regard to the disposition of U.S. territory and property be complied with fully. I hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations will schedule hearings on this resolution at an early date so that all aspects of the issue can be considered. Incredibly, there have never been hearings on this issue; yet the State Department has been blithely proceeding as though this were just a minor issue.

The resolution that I am offering today is simple and to the point. It states that it is the sense of the Senate that under the U.S. Constitution any right, title, or interest of the United States in any territory, Outer Continental Shelf, exclusive economic zone or fishery conservation zone may only be transferred to another country by treaty, within the meaning of article II, section 2, clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution, and by enactment of Congress in accordance with article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution.

Mr. President, the President has the power to make treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators concur. There is no dispute over the President's power to make treaties. All we are saying in this resolution is that this matter is a matter which should be handled by treaty. It is not a matter to be considered as a technical issue settled by an Executive order.

Mr. President, the treatymaking power does not stand alone. Where U.S. territory and property is concerned, there are further requirements. Our Constitution in article IV, section 3, clause 2 states clearly that, "(t)he Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Nowhere, does our Constitution state that the Department of State has the power to hand over U.S. territory to a foreign power by means of an executive agreement or other similar instrument.

The historical facts about United States sovereignty over these islands are clear. Unfortunately, the Department of State has been spreading all manner of disinformation concerning these islands not only to Members of Congress but also to the public at large.

In a letter to me, the State Department referred to this matter as a maritime boundary issue. It stated that all of these islands are claimed by the U.S.S.R. The State Department went on to say that: "It has been alleged that the United States has claimed sovereignty over the five islands"—it is noteworthy that the State Department states the Soviet claim as an accepted fact, whereas it asserts that "after extensive research, the Department of State has not found any evidence that the Government of the United States has ever formally asserted a claim to any of these islands."

That statement is totally false. In fact, one of my illustrious predecessors representing North Carolina in the Senate, Senator Robert R. Reynolds, dealt with this matter extensively in 1940. The State Department simply has not bothered to look into the historical record. I have spent some months researching that record, including diaries of the period newspaper accounts of the discovery period—including previously overlooked accounts in Honolulu newspapers of the last century—the U.S. Geological Survey, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and other official documents of record.

So let us be clear about the historical record.

Wrangell Island was discovered during the voyage of Captain Thomas Long, a citizen of the United States, aboard the barque "Nile" in 1867. A new account of this confirmed discovery appeared in the Pacific Commercial Advertiser, published in Honolulu on November 9, 1867.

First possession of Wrangell Island was formalized during the voyage of Capt. Calvin L. Hooper of the U.S. revenue marine steamer Corwin in 1881. Information about this voyage was printed in Senate Executive Document No. 204 in the first session of the 48th Congress. The title of this report is, "Report of the U.S. Revenue Marine Steamer Thomas Corwin, in the Arctic Ocean." The House of Representatives also printed reports about this voyage during the second session of the 47th Congress; and during the first session of the 50th Congress.

Mr. President, on March 25, 1922, the distinguished Senator Joseph T. Robinson placed a letter in the RECORD written to him by the Captain Commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard, W.E. Reynolds. In his letter, Commandant Reynolds notes that he was a junior officer aboard the Corwin and was the officer assigned to carry our flag during the landing on Wrangell Island on August 12, 1881. In the letter he states, and I quote, "The captain and I landed together, being the first to get ashore, I had the flag, and with the captain's permission waved it and took possession of the new land in the name of liberty and of the Government of the United States of America."

Mr. President, the words of Captain Reynolds of the U.S. Coast Guard are certainly crystal clear with respect to taking formal possession of Wrangell Island.

Senators should also take note of the following entry in the log book of Captain Hooper, and I quote:

> Friday, August 12, 1881. Lat. 71-04 Long. 177-40 off Wrangle Land. Got underway at 4:00 a.m. After a good deal of bumping and squeezing we reached the land and anchored in a small clear space off the mouth of a small river. Went on shore and took possession in the name of the U.S.

This quotation is contained in a study entitled, "The Discovery of Wrangel Island" by Samuel L. Hooper. It was published by the California Academy of Sciences as Occasional Paper No. XXIV, in San Francisco in 1956.

Prof. John Muir, a member of this expedition, wrote in his book that, and I quote, "A notable addition was made to the national domain when Captain Calvin L. Hooper landed on Wrangell Land and took formal possession in the name of the United States." John Muir, one of our Nation's most famous naturalists, was the founder of the Sierra Club.

The famed arctic explorer Vilhjalmar Steffansson in his book, "The Adventure of Wrangel Island" describing an expedition undertaken in 1921, wrote that, and I quote, "* * * following 1881 * * * the island was United States territory.

The Soviets have, in the past, claimed that a Russian Lieutenant Wrangel discovered the island. This assertion is groundless according to the Lieutenant's own memoirs. Wrangell himself wrote in his book, "The Narrative of a Voyage to the Polar Seas in the Years 1821, 1822, and 1823" that, and I quote, "* * * with a painful feeling of the impossibility of overcoming the obstacles with which nature had opposed us, our last hope vanished of discovering the land which we yet believed to exist * * * we had done what duty and honor demanded, further attempts would have been absolutely hopeless and I decided to return."

Mr. President, the matter of Wrangell Island was before the Senate and the House of Representatives in 1939 and 1940. With the gathering storm of World War II about to engulf our Nation, Members of the Senate and the House became concerned about our Pacific air routes. A bill was offered in the House by Congressman Maas authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to construct a naval air station on Wrangell Island. The bill, H.R. 4286, was introduced on February 17, 1939, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The State Department influenced the committee to take no action on the bill.

Mr. President, a similar bill was introduced in the Senate by a distinguished predecessor of mine from the State of North Carolina, Senator Robert R. Reynolds. While no action was taken on the bill, in the following year, Senator Reynolds introduced a resolution and articles relative to ownership of Wrangell Island.

Mr. President, so that our colleagues may have Senator Reynold's resolution and statement for immediate reference, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Senator Reynolds of Monday, April 8, 1940, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit 1.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a scholarly article entitled, "The Right of American Sovereignty over Wrangell Island," by Mr. David Nolan and Mr. Mark Seidenberg which appeared in the Canadian historical journal published by the University of Saskatchewan, "Musk Ox," be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit 2.

On March 18, 1878, the Senate and the House of Representatives approved an act in aid of a polar expedition designed by James Gordon Bennett, a U.S. citizen which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the vessel Jeannette which had been purchased in Great Britain.

On February 27, 1878, the Senate and the House of Representatives approved an act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept and to take charge of the ship Jeannette for the purpose of a north polar expedition.

Jeannette Island was discovered on May 16, 1881, and formally taken possession of on June 3, 1881, during the congressionally authorized voyage of U.S. Navy Commander George Washington De Long on the Jeannette.

Henrietta Island was discovered on May 24, 1881, and formally taken possession of on June 3, 1881, during this same voyage.

Bennett Island was discovered on July 11, 1881, and formally taken possession of on July 29, 1881, during this same voyage.

Mr. President, there is ample published historical material to verify these facts about the three De Long Islands. For example, Houghton Mifflin Co. published a two volume work in 1883 entitled "The Voyage of the Jeannette, The Ship and Ice Journals of George W. De Long." These were edited by his wife, Emma De Long. There is also an extensive collection of clippings and other information about this voyage at the Naval Academy in Annapolis.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from Captain De Long's journals relating to Henrietta. Jeannette, and Bennett islands be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as exhibit 3.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the appropriate citations on these five islands from the bulletin of the U.S. Geologic Survey, No. 187, entitled "Geographic Dictionary of Alaska," written by Marcus Baker, the Secretary of the U.S. Geologic Survey, and published in 1902 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit 4.

Senators should note that this "Geographic Dictionary of Alaska" was reprinted in a second edition in 1906 by the U.S. Geological Survey. The same citations to these five islands appear in this edition.

Mr. President, in 1930, the U.S. Geological Survey published its bulletin 817 which was entitled "Boundaries, Areas, Geographic Centers and Altitudes of the United States and the Several States." This publication was written by Mr. Edward M. Douglas and was a revision and enlargement of the 1923 edition. In the chapter entitled "Additions to the territory of the United States," Wrangell, Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette islands are described. Mysteriously and without explanation, or perhaps owing to the influence of the Department of State, these references were deleted from the 1966 and the 1976 edition of this work which were edited by Mr. Franklin van Zandt. According to information reaching my office, Mr. van Zandt had submitted his manuscript for the 1966 edition to the State Department and was told by the State Department to delete the reference to Wrangell, Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette islands.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the appropriate citations to these islands in the 1930 edition of this bulletin be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as exhibit 5.

The giveaway of these five islands to the masters of the Kremlin is not some obsecure action. In fact, back in North Carolilna, folks are concerned about this situation as are other citizens around the country judging by the mail that I have received on the issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an excellent article entitled "U.S. Considering Relinquising Control of Alaskan Islands" which appeared in the Laurinburg Exchange of Laurinburg, NC, on June 5, 1985 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit 6.

Mr. President, facts are facts. These five islands are U.S. territory. If the Department of State is endeavoring to give away these islands to the Soviet Union, including the related Outer Continental Shelf areas and economic zone areas, then it is the duty of the Congress to adhere to the Constitution in terms of how territory may be transferred.

Mr. President, this reolution simply expresses the sense of the Senate that the Constitution must be observed in cases where our territory is to be transferred. The resolution outlines the historical facts which I described earlier in order that an accurate description of the sovereign rights of the United States of America over these five islands be presented.

There being no objection, the exhibits were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT 1

[Extension of Remarks of Hon. Robert R. Reynolds of North Carolina in the Senate of the United States, April 8, 1940]

RESOLUTION AND ARTICLES RELATIVE TO OWNERSHIP

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, under the permission granted me during the course of my remarks, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the resolution (S. Res. 253) to which I referred; a statement which I have prepared with respect to Wrangell Island; an article from the Washington Post of February 26, 1939; and an article entitled "War of Propaganda May Be Already Won."

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 253

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to make a report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date with respect to whether or not the United States has a valid claim to sovereignty over Wrangell Island.

STATEMENT BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS OF NORTH CAROLINA

Wrangell Island is, roughly, the size and shape of Jamaica, 80 miles long and 35 miles wide. It is rugged rather than rocky with a maximum elevation of about 2,000 feet. So far as we know, there is no permanent ice of snow, with the snows of winter disappearing completely in summer. The minimum temperature in winter is only a little lower than that of Montreal, about the same as that of Winnipeg, and not nearly so low as that of some of the Russian cities. Because the island is small and surrounded by a small ocean, the warmest summers will not be far different from the month of May throughout some of the northwest sections of Canada and some of the northeast sections of the United States. Essentially it is a prairie land—no trees, and only small bushes. The beach is abundantly supplied with driftwood for fuel and for the building of log houses. It is probably the greatest polar bear country in the world. But bearskins have at present a small commercial value. There are no locations better for the trappings of white and blue foxes, and there are considerable quantities of the remains of the prehistoric elephants—mammoths of that fossil monster may be of some importance. It is an excellent station for the walrus and hair-seal industry. Nothing is known about the presence or absence of minerals. Great herds of reindeer are owned by natives and whites in Alaska and suitable breeding stock could be purchased at reasonable cost and landed in Wrangell Island.

Probably Wrangell Island could support some ten to twenty thousand herd equally in value to double that numbers of sheep.

Although the commercial value of Wrangell Island is small, it is not negligible. As a matter of fact I should not have been in the least interested in this island, however, but for my belief that within 25 years from now the Polar Ocean will be one of the chief theaters of air commerce. It is true that we of the United States have planty of rich land to develop, both at home and in our Territories, particularly in Alaska, and in speaking of Alaska, may I say that I believe that we have come to need badly a supply station under our own flag somewhere on the northern frontier of Asia such as Wrangell Island, for remember that Asia, Russian territory, is located within a stone's throw of our American Territory of Alaska. Fact is, the Little Diamede Island, which we acquired from Russia together with Alaska and Pribilof in the Aleutian Islands for a consideration of $7,200,000, is only about one-half mile from the Big Diamede Island which belongs to Russia itself.

Every other island on this vast northern frontier of Asia is clearly the property of some other nation, either by discovery or by occupation, but I believe that this one spot, Wrangell Island, is clearly ours and the longer that we let it go and remain in the hands of Russia, as of now, the more difficult will be our chance of obtaining our legal rights.

From a purely commercial standpoint as of now, the island would not be worth anything to us, but as I have heretofore stated, within 25 years from now it would be a very valuable spot, so my chief design, that what I have said and done, shall rest entirely on the grounds of public interest and public spirit.

If one looks at the Polar Ocean on a globe, which is the only way of correctly realizing the situation, you will note that Wrangell Island lies straight across from New York and is almost directly in line between the metropolis of New York and Manila, the capital of the Philippine Commonwealth. Even though it is not strategically the most important island on the northern coast of Siberia, it is the only island to which the United States Government has a claim on that vast frontier.

A couple of years ago when I was in Alaska and at which time I visited Point Barrow, the northernmost point in the Western Hemisphere, as well as Deering, Wainwright. Nome, and Siberian waters, friends of mine there and others whom I have met from time to time and place to place who were familiar with Siberia, impressed upon me how the Japanese were penetrating northward into that great country. And, as a matter of fact, several years ago while in Russia I understood that the Soviet Government was encouraging the immigration of its nationals from the congested cities such as Odessa, Leningrad, and Moscow to Siberia and its northeastern portions on the mainland in the neighborhood of Wrangell Island.

At the present time I am informed that a number of Chuckhees, Russian nationals, are occupying the island as a result of our nationals having been forcibly taken from the island a number of years ago, concerning which incident I shall return to shortly. We have never asked submission of the question to some form of international court, in which case their occupation, coupled with our neglect, could have established ownership, so in this bill I am merely asking that our State Department inquire into the question of whether or not the United States has a valid claim to sovereignty over this island.

It is my information that in September of 1921 several Britishers, together with a small party of Eskimos, landed on Wrangell Island, where they raised the British flag, which they claimed was the third time that the British flag had been placed upon the soil of Wrangell Island. At that time there were some press stories in the United States to the effect that our Government had protested against Britain's occupation of this island, but as to whether or not these statements are authentic I have not been informed. At that time, however, it is my understanding that the Soviet Government of Russia did protest. This protest contained three reasons on account of which Wrangell Island was said to be Russian.

The first reason was discovery of the island by Baron Wrangell a little more than a hundred years ago. Close students of the baron's journey at the time that he was supposed to have discovered Wrangell Island will reveal that he was never anywhere near it. And in addition to that he states in his description definitely that he failed to discover land. Confirmation of this can be obtained easily.

The second Russian claims are on the basis of a landing between the years 1910 and 1915. As a matter of fact, any nation could have claimed Wrangell Island on the basis of a landing in 1910, 1915, or 1921, the latter of which was claimed by the British.

Thirdly, the Russians advance the claim that Wrangell Island is Russian by reason of its immediate proximity to Siberia. The distance from Siberia is about 100 miles, and as to this claim for ownership through proximity might possibly be agreed upon by some future international convention, but it certainly has not been agreed upon in the past.

In the year 1880 or 1881 the New York Herald fitted out a Polar expedition under the command of Lieutenant De Long, an officer on leave of absence from the United States Navy. This was the famous and tragic Jeannette expedition, so called after the ship which De Long took north through the Pacific and through the Bering Straits proceeding into the ice which he met northwest of Alaska, firm in the belief that just beyond were the shores of a great continent. Shortly thereafter, while the Jeannette expedition was found in the ices of the great Polar region, the American flag was planted on Wrangell Island either by a member of his expedition or by one of the crew of an expedition that went in search of the members of the Jeannette expedition.

I claim that Wrangell Island is originally the property of the United States through right of discovery, but it is a principle of international law that claims arising out of the discovery must be followed up within any reasonable time by exploration or occupancy or else it lapses into the territory of a no-man's island.

The British claim some sort of title as of 1854, by way of discovery or otherwise, and the Russians claim title for the same or similar reasons; but, after all, it is not disputed that the American flag was placed on Wrangell Island in 1881 or 1882, and it was actually occupied by the nationals of the United States when the Russian nationals, forcibly and against their will, removed the nationals of the United States from the island to Siberia, and I understand that since then the Russians have occupied the island.

I think it is pretty well conceded—at least, there is no information to the effect—that any human being ever landed on Wrangell Island before the Americans did in 1881, and we know pretty definitely that no landing was made upon the island thereafter for many, many years.

Those who claim to have a knowledge of aerial navigation say that conditions on the whole there are better than in any other area in the world, and, of course, for the time being, we are interested in the acquisition of this island for the reason that, as I have heretofore stated, within 25 years it will be a very valuable spot, as the condition of the island is such that, without great difficulty or excessive expense, airplane bases could be established. Some have ventured that a harbor at one end of the island is so enclosed that aquaplanes could make safe landings, and in the winter, with the airport covered with snow, great passenger and freight planes could land safely on skis. Not only are flying conditions over the polar area on the whole good, according to those who are familiar with this section, but it is much the smaller of the oceans and therefore the easiest ocean to cross. As the settlements creep northward along the great rivers of Siberia and Canada, the polar mediterranean will continually increase in importance through the airways above which connects the various lands.

In conclusion, may I say that Russia is now in the possession of Wrangell Island. I claim that that possession was obtained by force and not by discovery. Of course, on account of Wrangell Island's being in the immediately proximity of Russian territory, it would be easy for Russia to seize and difficult for us to defend, but surely it would be possible to establish the ownership of the island at an international conference. If Russia—or any other country for that matter—then acted contrary to the decision of the conference, the facts would at least be known and the blame would be laid where it was deserved; and again I wish to say that to use Wrangell Island as a base we would have there a short cut for airplanes flying over the top of the globe from New York to Manila instead of around the circumference by such routes as are taken by ships and trains.

Wrangell Island has an area of about 2,000 square miles. Its elevation rises to 2,500 feet, but there is much less land on the south and north. Shoals and sand spits project to sea on the north and southwest. The west and east coast are steep and lofty. The harbor is on the southeast. Tundra covers many parts.

In 1923 a party of Eskimos under an Alaskan trapper were established on Wrangell Island, but Russia, laying stress on the claim made around 1915, forcibly removed the colony in August of 1924 and shortly afterward brought 50 Chuckhees to form a settlement under Soviet officials, and I understand that the colony was visited by Russian airplanes in 1927. At that time these claims were not officially disputed by the United States, according to my information.

Last year I introduced a bill in Congress calling for the establishment of naval bases on Wrangell Island. This resolution was referred to the Naval Committee of the Senate, and no action to date has been taken thereupon. Fact of the matter is, I think that I was a little premature in the introduction of that resolution. I probably then should have introduced a bill such as I am introducing today, requesting the Secretary of State to make a report to the Senate at the earliest practical date with respect to whether or not the United States has a valid claim to sovereignty over Wrangell Island; and then, after the establishment of this claim, if an international congress awards the island to the United States, then would be the proper time for a bill calling for the establishment of naval bases there. At any rate, last year, when I introduced the aforementioned bill, which was referred to the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, there appeared in the Washington Post under date of February 26, 1939, an article entitled "United States Owns Wrangell Island. Not Soviet, Says Reynolds," and the subhead of that story reads. "Retired rear admiral, who planted American flag, revives controversy of Arctic possession." I wish to have this article at this juncture printed as a part of my remarks.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, and I hope that we may shortly ascertain the rightful owner of this island, which in the future, I am confident, will prove to be a most valuable possession.

UNITED STATES OWNS WRANGELL ISLAND, NOT SOVIET, SAYS REYNOLDS—RETIRED ADMIRAL, WHO PLANTED AMERICAN FLAG THERE, REVIVES CONTROVERSY OVER ARCTIC POSSESSION

Because "first come first served" still is the law of the masterless lands, Rear Admiral William Edward Reynolds, retired, believes the Russians ought to get off Wrangell Island.

It is a matter of personal pride to him, for he "came first," in this case, he said, and planted the American flag on that ice-bound spot in the Arctic Sea one August morning in 1881.

There is a first-class international squabble ready to flare up over this disputed land, and it was another Reynolds who started it.

Last Friday Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, introduced a bill in the Senate to establish a naval air base on Wrangell Island, but there is small chance of doing that while the Russians are there.

It seems that in 1924, taking advantage of a claim they had made in 1916 that had never been officially disputed, the Russians abducted one Charles Wells, an American sailor from Seattle, and 12 Eskimos peacefully engaged in fishing and hunting and otherwise making good America's title to the sport, and replaced them with a colony of enthusiastic Communists.

RESTRAINS HIS PRIDE

This is a pretty intolerable situation for 79-year-old William Reynolds, who retired as rear admiral in the Coast Guard just when this was going on. But, mild-mannered and dignified, he restrained his outraged pride yesterday and spoke of the arrogant Bolsheviks with creditable courtesy.

"I don't know what right they had to take our island," he remarked, "but then I don't know much about international law. I took possession of Wrangell Island for the United States, and we were the first white men that ever landed there. Of course, it's named after a Russian, Baron Wrangell, but he never reached the island; he just saw it."

As a matter of fact, it was something of an accident that led to that historic landing party, the gray-haired seaman admitted. The steamship Corwin, on which he was a junior officer at the time, was not sailing about the Artic looking for new lands for Uncle Sam. She was searching for survivors of the exploring ship Jeannette crushed by ice just before.

They did't find any survivors, but they found a lot of polar bears and walrus, and a good plateau now useful as an airplane landing field, and they presented this chilly spot to the State Department to file away for the future.

FIFTEEN YEARS TOO LATE

Now Senator REYNOLDS has found a use for it, but he is 15 years too late. When, in 1924, Commander M. Davidoff came back in triumph to Vladivostock with Wells and his Eskimos he proudly boasted that once more the proletarian revolution had scored over the "imperialists," who were attempting to "seize the island" because it "would have made an ideal aerial base."

Poor Wells died before he ever got away from Siberia and as Rear Admiral Reynolds is the last survivor of the officers on that historic cruise of the Corwin, he is now the only principal of the drama of Wrangell still able to tell the tale.

But Wells' sponsor, Carl J. Lomen, is still very much alive, and so in his claim against the Russian Government for the 167 fox skins and 40 polar bear skins they relieved him of in 1924, not to mention damage against his firm, the Loman Reindeer & Trading Corporation, which brought from an English firm the trading interests in the island just in time to have them seized behind their backs by the conquering Russian revolutionaries.

But after all, the whole thing rests with the State Department, and the State Department isn't interested now. Maybe if we build that air base Senator Reynolds wants there will be a showdown, and the Russians will be forced to admit the validity of Rear Admiral Reynolds' deed, and pay Lomen his damages. Such as least is the hope of Reynolds, Reynolds, and Lomen.

WAR OF PROPAGANDA MAY BE ALREADY WON—HUNGER IN JOBLESS HOME MORE PERILOUS THAN ANY FOREIGN SPY, IS VIEW

The little man, sitting in his little home, and wondering where he can get another pail of coal, will ultimately decide whether we get into war or stay out, asserts Samuel Grafton, writing in the New York Post. He adds:

"We are being told to watch out for propaganda. Good enough. But in the larger sense, this is a false steer. The propaganda fight has already been fought and won by the Allies. The United States now hates Hitler more than it hated the Kaiser in 1916. The toothiest of British lectures can add only a drop to the brimming bucket of our hate.* * *

"History is made when the father of the family says he isn't hungry and slides his food down-table to his children, and the kids take it, trying not to think that's all there is, there isn't any more.

"History is made when the foreman at the plant tells John Smith. American worker, that he can't give him a job until the factory gets another war order, but that the factory isn't getting war orders because the Neutrality Act forbids lending money to the Allies. The muse of history really begins to smirk when John Smith walks down the factory street, feeling the stones through his shoes and wondering why the devil we shouldn't lend money to the Allies when it means a job a man can work at and feed his kids with.

"A decent peacetime job would keep John Smith from making this decision.* * *

"Tracing out the figures nationally, I find that the total of W.P.A. workers has been cut almost in half, from 3,043,367 in February to 1,661,970 in September. The rise in war boom employment doesn't even remotely correspond to this wholesale slaughter of W.P.A. pay envelopes. The cut occurs at a time when a job is the best and most vital antiwar progaganda of all, because it talks to a man 7 days a week and 24 hours a day.

"I have a feeling that we are flunking our national test. We are depending on a Neutrality Act, a dike of words against a sea of need and blood. We are asking men to consult the national interest first, at a time when the interests of their children clamor in their ears. We are asking the little man to be big. That is the measure of the smallness of our approach.

"The stage for war, the stage for our participation, is being set. It is a bare stage and on it are a few kitchen chairs, an empty table, a congealing stove; in one of the chairs sits a man who fears the morning and who will accept any hope that comes. So far, we have been afraid to look at him."

EXHIBIT 2

THE RIGHT OF AMERICAN SOVEREIGNTY OVER WRANGELL ISLAND

(David B. Nolan* and Mark J. Seidenberg)

ABSTRACT

The dispute over rightful sovereignty to Wrangell Island today continues as an international issue of the Arctic. The Soviet Union, United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada at one time or other have asserted interests over this frozen piece of tundra and mountain. The proximity of the island to both the U.S. and Russia has great strategic value in our push-button nuclear age. The issue itself has implications for the resurgence of American military might, for superpower detente, and for international law.

The history of Wrangell Island is filled with courage and tragedy. It is a tale of kidnapping and death.

The valiant Captain Calvin L. Hooper, the de facto governor of the Alaska territory, was the first to land on Wrangell Island. He claimed the island for the United States which perfected this claim through effective occupation in accordance with international law.

The Soviet government seized control of Wrangell Island in 1924 and took American citizens into custody. This act is held to have been in violation of international law and American statutes that sought to protect U.S. territorial rights.

Hence the Soviet Union is believed to have occupied Wrangell Island illegally until the present time. International law does not allow any nation to gain sovereignty in such a fashion. The U.S. sovereignty over Wrangell has never been legally ceded to the Soviet Union, either on account of treaty or due to U.S. inaction.

* * * * *

Extensive exploration of the Arctic did not occur until the nineteenth century. It is not surprising that Wrangell Island, one of the largest yet most inaccessible islands in the Arctic did not become known to the world until this time.

Wrangell Island [2] is located eighty-five miles off the northeast coast of Siberia and two hundrd seventy miles northwest of Cape Lisbourne, Alaska. It straddles the 180° meridian and the 71° parallel and encompasses an area to two thousand square miles. As with other islands in the Arctic Ocean, accessibility is limited by thick fog and sea ice. Impenetrable ice floes block access even to its southern shore for at least ten months of each year.

Four nations have asserted interests over this island—the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and Canada. The superiority of the claim by the United States can best be understood when placed in the perspective of arctic history and international law.

Early recorded explorations into the Arctic did not intend to lay formal claim to and take effective occupatin of, arctic territory. Without these elements sovereignty will not arise over discovered land. The Greek navigator Pytheas of Massila made the first recorded voyage into the Arctic Ocean in the fourth century. B.C.E., but was turned back by fog and ice.[3] The next recorded voyage into the Arctic of any significance was by a Norse chief named Otar who sailed into the White Sea, after passing the Kola Peninsula.[4]

By the sixteenth century, England and other maritime nations sought better trade routes to the Orient than the long and arduous routes around the Cape of Good Hope and Cape Horn. In the year 1553 English merchants organized voyages to China by the Northwest Passage across the top of Europe and Asia.[5] In 1594 the Dutch navigator Willem Barents sailed into the Kara Sea.[6]

A Cossack trader named Simon Dexhnev sailed eastward from the Kolyma River in the summer of 1648. The natives of eastern Siberia told him of a "large country" lying to the north of Chukchi and Alaska. He was the first white man to hear of this land called Beringia.[7]

In 1763, another Cossack named Andreyev heard of this land and traveled to the Medvezhi Ostrova to find it. He claimed to have seen a large land to the East from that island location. However, six years later three Russian surveyors named Leontev, Lesev, and Pushkarov confirmed that there was no land that could be seen from such location.[8] Mirages of islands are not uncommon in the Arctic. This factor, added to the difficulty of obtaining star readings for location determinations in arctic fog, have often made land sightings unreliable.

Baron Ferdinand Petrovich von Wrangell, a lieutenant in the Imperial Russian Navy, also heard the tale of the land's existence from the Chukchi chiefs of Siberia. Between 1820 and 1824 he commanded several expeditions in search of the island but he never saw it, let alone land on or occupy it.[9] In April of 1824, at the end of his last arctic expedition, Wrangell wrote:

"[W]ith a painful feeling of the impossibility of overcoming the obstacles which nature opposed to us, our last hope vanished of discovering the land which we believed to exist. We saw ourselves compelled to renounce the object for which we had been striving through three years of hardships and danger." [10]

Despite this failure, Wrangell gained worldwide fame as an arctic explorer. He later became Governor of Russian America. Yet he was never to land upon the island that would bear his name in his honour.

During the mid-nineteenth century, England, still looking for a short-cut to the Orient, attempted to find a Northwest Passage. In 1845 Sir John Franklin left England with a company of 129 to travel over the top of America to Petropavlovsk, Kamachatka. By September, 1846, the expedition's ships had become locked in an ice pack twelve miles from King William Island.

On 11 June 1847 Sir John Franklin died. On 22 April 1848 the ships Erebus and Terror were deserted and what was left of their crew started on a hopeless march to safety. No one survived.[11]

By 1848 the Royal Geographical Society became concerned over the ships' disappearance and the British Admiralty agreed to its request to organize a search. The United States and Canada also organized searches for the missing ships.

On 6 August 1849, Captain Henry Kellett, R.N., of H.M.S. herald, one of the Franklin search vessels, arrived at a small island west of Cape Lisburne. Upon landing, Kellett took possession and named the island Herald after his ship. He hoisted the Union Jack and claimed the island on behalf of Queen Victoria.[12]

Kellett sighted a large land mass beyond Herald Island to the west which he called Plover in honor of another Franklin relief expedition ship. Whereas no land mass existed at the position noted by Kellett on navigation charts, it may have been a mirage rather than Wrangell Island. In any event, no further landing or exploration was made.

Six years later, on 13 August 1855 Captain John Rogers, in his flagship the U.S.S Vincennes, reached the position ascribed to Plover Island, also known as Kellett Land on the Admiralty charts.[13] When there was no land to be seen from the clear horizons, the charts by the Depot of Charts and Instruments of the U.S. Navy were changed accordingly. It should be noted that the Russian author Shvede gives credit to the American, Rogers, for discovering Wrangell Island [14] on that Congressionally authorized voyage.[15]

The United States' legal rights in the northwest of the North American Continent have a foundation in the Treaty of Adamsde Onus of 22 February 1821 which ceded Spanish rights in Oregon Country to the U.S.[16] The United States' claims to northern parts of the Oregon Country (now southern Alaska) are based, in part, upon voyages of discovery and annexation by Don Juan Francisco de la Bodega y Quadra and Don Ignacio Arteiga for the Spanish Government between 1775–1779.[17]

H.I.M. Tsar Aleksandr Pavlovich of Russia issued a ukase in 1821 banning "transaction of Commerce, and the pursuit of whaling and fishing or any other industry • • • all along the North West Coast of America from the Bering Sea to the 51st parallel." [18] This coast was part of the area ceded to the United States by Spain in 1821. The Tsar's ukase prompted U.S. President Monroe, in his message to Congress on 2 December 1823, to proclaim the Monroe Doctrine. A compromise was reached on 11 January 1825. The United States government ceded the coast of America north of the 54°40' parallel to the Imperial Russian Government as part of a Treaty of Navigation and Fisheries of the Northwest Coast.[19]

As well be seen, this accord was superseded by the Seward-de Stoechl Treaty in 1867 which ceded Russian America to the United States. The 1825 treaty has no bearing on sovereignty over Wrangell Island which was undiscovered at the time.

By the middle of the nineteenth century, Russian interests in expansion beyond the Asian mainland waned just as American interest in expanding to the West increased. The loss of the Crimean War illustrated the vulnerability of the Russian Empire at its extremities.

The Russian government, fearing that its American colony was no longer defensible and recognizing its economic liability, sold the North American lands to the United States for 7.2 million dollars on 20 June 1867.[20] This convention between the governments of Russia and the United States ended all Russian claims to sovereignty east of the demarcation line.

On 18 October 1867 the Tsarist double eagle flag was lowered over Novoarkhangelsk, the capital of Russian-America, and the Stars and Stripes was hoisted over the renamed city of Sitka. Alaska was now a possession of the United States.[21]

The Office of the Solicitor, U.S. Department of State, determined after a review of the documents leading up to and including the Seward-de Stoechl treaty "that the Emperor of all the Russias ceded to the United States certain territories, and that the United States on its part entered into no commitment which could be interperted as an understanding not to press claim to any land west of the particular line above described." [22] Therefore, there can be no inference that the United States ceded sovereignty to any as yet undiscovered island to the west of the Diomede Islands.

During this period the American whaling industry expanded into arctic waters. On 14 August 1867 Captain Thomas Long of New London, Connecticut, sailed his whaling bark Nile along a trek some thirty miles north of the route navigated by U.S.S. Vincennes some twelve years earlier. A seaman named Thomas sighted land (Cape Thomas) to the northeast from the ship's masthead. Captain Long named this territory "Wrangell's Land" as an appropriate tribute to the memory of the Russian explorer who spent three consecutive years above the 69th parallel.[23] Long also was the first to sight the identifying volcano of more than 2000 feet in height on Wrangell Island. He sailed past the southern shore and returned to the port of Honolulu. Between 1868 and 1869 the news of the American discovery of "Wrangell's Land" spread worldwide. Geographical Societies in the United States and Europe honored Captain Long for his discovery.[24]

Other American whalers—the captains Raynor of the Reindeer, Philips of the Monticello, and Biler of the Nautilus also confirmed the sighting of the large land mass discovered by Thomas Long. They spread their belief that Wrangell was not an island but a frozen continent similar to that at the South Pole, a speculation that prompted the New York Herald to outfit an expedition in 1879, led by Naval Lieutenant George Washington De Long, to Wrangell Island and then the North Pole.[25] De Long and his ship, the Jeannette, formerly called the Pandora, never made it. The Jeannette became locked in ice floes and drifted westward past Wrangell Island where it was crushed and sunk in the summer of 1881.

Fearing for the fate of De Long, the U.S. Congress in early 1881 authorized one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars for a search. The Jeannette relief ships, the U.S. Revenue Marine Steamer, the Thomas Corwin and the U.S.S. John Rogers entered the Bering Sea in the summer of 1881. Commanding officer of the Corwin was Captain Calvin Leighton Hooper.

Hooper at the time commanded the Bering Sea Patrol of the U.S. Revenue

Marine, which made him the de facto Governor of Alaska. During the spring of 1877 jurisdiction of the District of Alaska was transferred from the Department of War to the Treasury Department. Treasury in turn placed Alaska under the charge of the U.S. Revenue Marine from that year until 1884.[26] Hooper clearly had authority at that time to discover and claim sovereignty over land on behalf of the United States.[27] The Corwin also carried aboard a complement of scientists. These included the world renowned naturalist, John Muir, who was later to found the Sierra Club.

The Corwin landed on Herald Island in hopes of finding the Jeannette or its crew. Unsuccessful in the rescue attempt. Hooper valiantly forced his ship through heavy ice floes to Wrangell Island to the west.[28]

On 12 August 1881, Hooper, Muir, and their party of six made the first recorded landing by man upon Wrangell Island. Edward W. Nelson, a member of the landing party later noted.

"The result of our examination of the Island, so far as we saw, gave not the slightest evidence of its ever having been visited by man before. All subsequent examinations of Wrangell Island by those who have visited it later appear to establish the fact that the landing party from the Corwin contained the first men to set foot on this island." [29]

Landing at the mouth of the Clark River on the eastern side of the island. Hooper and his fellow officers raised the American flag and took possession of Wrangell Island in the name of the United States. While Hooper and Muir explored the island, other party members erected a rock cairn and deposited documents recording the significant event. William Reynolds, a member of the party, recalled:

"I had the flag and with the Captain's permission waved it and took possession of the new land in the name of liberty and of the Government of the United States of America. I planted the flag on a bluff a little to the northwest of our landing place and left it there together with a record of our visit." [30]

Hooper called the island "New Columbia." He explained.

"It was believed that as the island had become, by our act of landing upon it, a part of the United States, by selecting a name of national character, no disrespect would be shown to the memory or offense given to the friends of the gallant officer whose name it bore, and that the name given would be adopted by all nations." [31]

The name "New Columbia" never replaced Wrangell, however.

Captain Hooper told Captain L. C. Owens of the American whaler Belvedere of his plan to annex Wrangell Island to the United States prior to landing there. The Belvedere became the second ship to land at Wrangell on 19 August 1881. "As soon as we got ashore we saw the signal planned by Lieutenant Reynolds, a small American ensign fastened to a slender piece of driftwood, driven into the soil," confirmed a Belvedere crew member.[32]

On 26 August 1881 a party from the Rogers, the other relief ship, landed on Wrangell Island. They completed an official survey for the U.S. Government on 13 September of the same year. One crew expedition proceeded overland to the mountains, where a general view of land and water could be obtained. Another group found the cairn left by the Corwin, and deposited copies of the documents contained therein, taking the originals for the Navy's report. The crew of the U.S.S. Rogers also raised the American flag over Wrangell Island.[33] The crew determined that its new U.S. possession was not a continent but a large island.

Major E. W. Clark, the Chief of the United States Revenue Marine Service, informed the U.S. Coast and Geological Survey in 1881 of the annexation of Wrangell Island to the United States. The U.S.C. & G.S. of the U.S. Treasury Department determined that Wrangell Island should be included in the District of Alaska.[34]

Between the years 1881 and 1910 Wrangell Island was visited exclusively by Americans. These were mostly whalers and walrus and seal hunters. On 8 September 1889 the U.S.S. Thetis went to Wrangell Island while cruising the Arctic Ocean, "showing the American flag." [35] In the year 1910 Captain Louis Lane sailed the ship Adler of Nome, Alaska, to Wrangell Island with a motion picture company from Hollywood, which filmed a polar bear hunt.

For a period of twenty-nine years following Hooper's claim, U.S. and Russian publications recognized United States sovereignty over Wrangell. U.S. Geological Survey Bulletins No. 169 in 1900, No. 187 in 1902, and Nos. 274 and 299 in 1906 included Wrangell Island as part of the U.S. Russian Naval Maps and Encyclopedia at the turn of the century also show the same designation.

In 1910 the Imperial Russian government, interested in compiling hydrographic charts to facilitate shipping routes from Kolyma to Vladivostok, commissioned two steel icebreaking ships, the Vaigatch and Taimyr. On 16 September 1911 the Vaigatch anchored in a cove off Blossom Point at the southwest corner of Wrangell Island while taking shelter from a gale from the northeast.[36] Its captain sent a landing party ashore on 15 September via whaleboat and motor launch to establish the correct astronomical position by celestial observation. The landing party found a coal deposit and erected a ten meter structure to establish the astronomical position of the landing place before leaving.

The Russians then circumnavigated the island, but unfortunately at a distance too far to contribute to the definite outlining of the coast.[37] This was the only visit that the Russians ever made to the Wrangell Island before 1924, nor did they ever make any claim to the island during their stay.

In 1911 Dr. Rollin Harris, an American oceanographer, again raised interest in the possibility of an as-yet-undiscovered arctic continent. He hypothesized the existence of "Harris Land" to explain tidal movements in the Arctic Ocean.

In 1913 the National Geographic Society planned to finance an expedition to the Arctic to find this new land. Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, asked and received permission to finance the expedition for fear that Americans might make new discoveries north of Canada for the United States.[38]

Vilhjalmur Stefansson, a Canadian who had grown up on the plains of North Dakota, was chosen to lead the expedition. The Canadian government directed Stefansson that "any new or partly unknown lands which the expedition would touch would be observed, position fixed, and the British flag would be planted on these lands." [39]

Stefansson's flagship was the whaler Karluk under the mastery of Captain Robert A. Bartlett. Bartlett was a U.S. citizen who had commanded the ship Roosevelt for the Peary and Henson expedition to the North Pole during the years 1905 to 1909. The Karluk suffered the tragic fate of other vessels and became caught in arctic ice, drifted west along the north coast of Alaska, and eventually sank. For two months the survivors walked south across the polar ice cap, arriving at Wrangell Island on 12 March 1914. Two members of the ship's crew, John Munro and Robert Templeman, raised the Canadian flag over Wrangell Island in celebration of Dominion Day, 1 July 1914.

Of course, Wrangell Island had already been formally claimed by the United States, and the previous establishment of U.S. sovereignty served to cut off subsequent rival claims. Furthermore, Great Britain had transferred jurisdiction of her rights to islands in the Arctic Ocean to the Canadian Government in 1880.[40] Therefore, whatever pretention to sovereignty Great Britain might have had to Herald and Wrangell Islands by virtue of the voyage of the H.M.S. Hearld in 1849, or the landing on Wrangell in 1914, now belonged to Canada.

The shipwrecked members of the Karluk also recognized the prior discovery of Wrangell Island. Bartlett later wrote that "we passed Hooper cairn, which was built by a party from the U.S. Revenue cutter Corwin in August, 1881. The cairn, as I could see, was still intact." [41]

Captain Bartlett and an Eskimo crew member, Kakatovik, walked across the ice pack to summon help. Upon Bartlett's reaching Alaska, Captain William E. Reynolds, U.S.R.C.S., immediately ordered a rescue attempt. On 7 September 1914 the American ship King and Wing picked up the happy survivors on Wrangell Island (Figure 1). Not knowing that the Karluk survivors had already been rescued, the Thomas Corwin landed at Wrangell a few days later. The same ship that thirty-three years earlier had carried Hooper to claim the island, re-established the flying of the U.S. flag over Wrangell Island.

After the Karluk survivors were transferred to the U.S. Revenue Cutter Bear, they were transported to the ship's home port of Unalaska where the port commander, William Reynolds (who in 1881 had landed on Wrangell with Hopper) told Bartlett that the island was indeed part of Alaska.

On 13 November 1916 a challenge to U.S. sovereignty over Wrangell Island came from a different source. The Imperial Russian Embassy in Washington presented a memorandum to the U.S. Department of State regarding Russia's claim to lands in the Arctic. It claimed that Wrangell Island, Alaska, was one of the islands which "form an extension Northward of the Continental tableland of Siberia." [42] This argument, like that of the sphere of influence, continuity, or sector theory to the Pole has no validity in international law.[43] Before this claim could again be pressed the Imperial Russian Government was overthrown by the Bolsheviks. World events were to continue to play a major part in the issue of sovereignty over Wrangell.

On 7 July 1918 Allied Commanders, and an army that included Japanese troops, assumed protection of the city of Vladivostok. The threat of the Japanese taking an imperialistic hold in eastern Siberia caused concern, just as the expansion of power by the Bolsheviks had done formerly. In 1920 Stefansson became worried that the Japanese government, in their desire to control eastern Siberia, might try to take Wrangell

Island. He observed, "I felt certain that within a year of two they would realize the coming importance of Wrangell Island and would occupy it."

Great Britain, Japan, and the United States were allied against the Bolsheviks. However, if the Japanese (future Pacific rivals to the United States) were to occupy Wrangell Island, it would be difficult to oust them in favor of the Bolsheviks. Therefore, Stefansson met in Ann Arbor, Michigan, with Allen Crawford, a Canadian, and Sir Auckland Geddes, British Ambassador to the U.S., for the United Kingdom to plan an expedition to secure Wrangell Island and also to promote their own economic interests.

Crawford led a party that included four Americans on the American ship Silver Wave. When they landed on Wrangell Island on 15 September 1921 the crew raised the Stars and Stripes over the island under Captain Jack Hammer's direction. On 16 September 1921 Crawford raised the Union Jack over Wrangell "in the name of the King and the Empire" as a continuation of Stefansson's "right to the island already established by the Stefansson Canadian Arctic Expedition of 1913-18 and the shipwreck of the Karluk."[45] He did not tell anyone aboard the Silver Wave that he had raised the British flag over the island.

In 1922 it became cause célèbre in the British and American press that Stefansson and company had "claimed" Wrangell Island, Alaska, as part of the United Kingdom. Anglo-American relations became strained over an island in which Great Britain had shown no interest since the discovery of Herald Island in 1849.

The Crawford party landed with provisions for only six months, saying they planned to sustain themselves with hunting. Stefansson's relief mission in 1922 was blocked by ice floes. When Harold Noice arrived aboard the relief ship Donaldson on 20 August 1923 only an Eskimo seamstress named Ada Blackjack survived of the original group. A new party led by Charles Wells of Uniontown, Pennsylvania, continued settlement of the island.

When Stefansson realized in 1924 that the Canadian government would not back a sovereignty claim as to dominium directum rights he sold his title and his dominium utile interests in Wrangell Island to the Lomen Brothers company of Nome, Alaska (Figures 2(a) and 2(b)). On 13 May 1924 Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes declared that the Lomen Brothers were the owners of the island (Figure 3). On 18 June of that year, the British Colonial Secretary stated in a confidential dispatch: "The United States Government is thought to have a strong, if not indisputable, claim to the Island."[45a]

On 20 August 1924 the Soviet gunboat Red October landed on Wrangell Island, armed with a six-pound cannon and a company of Soviet infantry. The Soviets took Wells by force and the other thirteen Americans on the island and told them they were being taken to Alaska. Instead they were forcibly taken to Vladivostok.[46] The Soviet officials confiscated all the pelts which the trappers had accumulated during the twelve bitter months on the island.[47] Following intervention by the U.S. Consul at Harbin, Manchuria, the Soviets released the twelve Americans still living. The Bolsheviks claimed that Wells had died of pneumonia. His diary was never found.

A year later the Soviets proclaimed Wrangell Island as their territory. But in 1930 the U.S. Department of the Interior publication entitled Boundaries, Areas, Geographic Centers and Altitudes of the United States and the Several States expressly included Wrangell Island as an American possession. Since that time no abandonment by the U.S. of its rightful sovereignty has occurred, nor under international law could such abandonment occur following a deprivation of sovereignty by force.

Besides the abducting of Americans on Wrangell Island, the Russians violated federally promulgated Alaskan law that prohibits the exercise of foreign jurisdiction. The Alaskan Organic Act of 1884 adopted Oregon law, which in turn had adopted the Iowa Territory prohibitions against foreign governmental interference with American sovereignty.[48]

In 1973 the State Department reissued the Hackworth Digest of International Law which explained, "The United States has not relinquished its claim to Wrangell Island." In the centennial year of the American landing on Wrangell, the United States government's position has not changed. Captain Hooper formally claimed Wrangell Island on 12 August 1881 and the U.S. established effective occupation until the Soviet invasion.

THE VOYAGE OF THE JEANNETTE—THE SHIP AND ICE JOURNALS OF GEORGE W. DELONG, LIEUTENANT-COMMANDER U.S.N., AND COMMANDER OF THE POLAR EXPEDITION OF 1879-1881

The party landed on the island on Thursday, June 2d (Friday, June 3d), hoisted our silk flag, took possession of the island in the name of the Great Jehovak and the United States of America, and, agreeably to my orders, named it Henrietta Island. They build a cairn and placed within it the record which I send with them, and made as much examination of the island and search for vegetation as their limited stay would permit. The island is a desolate rock, surmounted by a snow-cap, which feeds several discharging glaciers on its east face. Dovekies, nesting in the face of the rock are the only signs of game. A little moss, some grass, and a handful of rock were brought back as trophies. The cliffs are inaccessible, because of their steepness. The ice between the ship and the island is something frightful. Road-digging, ferrying, and is attendant loading and unloading, arm-breaking hauls, and panic-stricken dogs made their journey a terribly severe one. Near the island the ice was all alive, and Melville left his boat and supplies, and carrying only a day's provisions and his instruments, at the risk of his life went through the terrible mass, actually dragging the dogs, which from fear refused to follow their human leaders. If this persistence on landing upon this island, in spite of the superhuman difficulties he encountered, is not reckoned a brave and meritorious action, it will not be from any failure on my part to make it known. I issued a general order communicating the names and positions of the two islands: Jeannette Island (our discovery of May 16th), in latitude N. 76°, longitude E. 158° 56'; and Henrietta Island (our discovery of May 24th), in latitude N. 78° 8', longitude E. 157° 43'; and in the evening I ordered a double ration of whiskey served out forward. At ten a.m. I read the Articles of War and inspected the ship, and at 1:30 p.m. I read divine service.

Bennett; island, in the Arctic ocean, north of the New Siberian islands. Discovered by De Long, in 1881, and named by him, after Mr. James Gordon Bennett.

Henrietta; island, in the Arctic ocean, north of the New Siberian islands. Discovered and so named by De Long in 1881.

Herald; island (856 feet high), east of Wrangell island, Arctic ocean. Discovered and landed upon in July, 1849, by Captain Kellett, of H.M.S. Herald and named by him after his ship.

Jeannette; island, northeast of the New Siberian islands, Arctic ocean. Discovered by De Long, in 1881, and named by him after his ship Jeannette.

Wrangell; island, off the northern shore of Siberia, northwesterly from Bering strait. The existence of this land was reported by natives, in March and April, 1823, to Baron von Wrangell, who then made an unsuccessful search for it. It was first clearly seen and its shore delineated by Capt. Thomas Long, of the New London whaling bark Nile, in August, 1867, and by him called Wrangell's Land. From that date to 1881 it was shown on maps as the south end of a tract extending indefinitely northward and, by some, thought to connect with Greenland across the north pole. Its insular character was established by Berry, in 1881, and since that time it has borne the name of Wrangell island. Possibly Plover island of Kellett, in 1849, may be some peak of this island seen from afar.

BOUNDARIES, AREAS, GEOGRAPHIC CENTERS AND ALTITUDES OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE SEVERAL STATES

WRANGELL ISLAND

Wrangell Island is in the Arctic Ocean, about 100 miles from the Siberian coast. A harbor in the southeastern part is in latitude 70° 57' N. and longitude 178° 10' W. The island is about 80 miles long and 30 miles wide; its highest point is 2,500 feet above sea level. It was sighted in 1867 by the captain of a United States sailing vessel. In 1881 officers from United States naval vessels landed on the island and claimed it for the United States.[1] According to newspaper reports of October 4, 1926, the Soviet Government had landed a colony of 50 persons on this island, hoisted the Russian flag, and claimed it for that country. An airplane survey is said to have been made and the area found to be 2,925 square miles.

BENNETT, HENRIETTA, AND JEANNETTE ISLANDS

Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette Islands were discovered by the DeLong polar expedition and claimed for the United States in 1881, but were only partly explored.

Bennett, the largest of the three, is about 300 miles from the mainland of Siberia, in latitude 76° 38' N., approximate longitude 149° E. This island probably has an area of several hundred square miles, possibly more than 1,000, and altitudes above sea level of 300 feet or more.

Henrietta Island is in latitude 77° 8' N., longitude 157° 45' E., and Jeannette Island in latitude 76° 47' N., longitude 158° 56' E.; each has an area of approximately 50 square miles and an altitude of more tha. 500 feet.[2]

U.S. CONSIDERS RELINQUISHING CONTROL OF ALASKAN ISLANDS

"The State Department appears ready and willing to surrender five strategic Alaskan islands and hundreds of thousands of square miles of oil-rich Alaskan outer continental shelf to the Soviet Union without full public debate and Senate ratification of a treaty," according to Carl Olson, Executive Vice President of The Conservative Caucus Research, Analysis & Education Foundation, Inc., of Vienna, Virginia.

"This giveaway of literally billions of barrels of America's oil reserves and Alaskan sovereign territory makes the Panama Canal fiasco look insignificant in comparison," Olson declared.

This giveaway was the subject of a high-level State Department delegation which went to Moscow for the week of July 23-27, headed by the department's Legal Adviser Davis Robinson and supported by his staff members Elizabeth Verville and Scott Hajost, and by Harry Marshall and Richard T. Scully of the department's Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs, and by Robert W. Smith of the office of the Geographer.

The enormous size of the giveaway of strategic oil reserves is reflected in official Department of the Interior estimates. The oil-rich outer continental shelf off Alaska is equal in area to six Californias—or three-quarters of the entire U.S. outer continental shelf. Seabeds equal to about twice the size of California lie to the east of the 1867 Convention Line, and seabeds equal to about four Californias lie to the west in the vicinity of the Alaskan islands of Wrangell, Herald, Bennett, Heneritta, and Jeannette. The estimated hydrocarbon reserves of the seabeds to the east of the 1867 Convention Line are 12.2 billion barrels of oil equivalent. (The Navarin Basin alone contains 1.9 billion barrels of reserves.) To the west of the 1867 line, which has twice the area, the reserves have not been officially estimated, but it would not be unreasonable to place them at twice the amount for the area to the east of the line. Or, in other words, the State Department is contemplating giving away about 25 billion barrels of oil equivalent to the Soviets.

The State Department's basis for the giveaway involves its novel (and incorrect) portrayal of the "U.S.-Russia Convention Line of 1867", which was used in the purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000.

This stance by the State Department appeared in the Federal Register notice of the leasing of the Navarin Basin (p. 10065, March 16, 1964). In paragraph 16, under the heading "Jurisdiction", was the following language: "The differing claims relate to differing depictions of the line established by the 1867 Conventions Ceding Alaska between the United States and Russia. The United States depicts the 1867 Convention Line as the maritime boundary by arcs of great circles while the Soviet Union depicts the 1867 Convention Line as rhumb lines." There is no question in the State Department's position that the 1867 Convention Line is "the maritime boundary".

Contradicting this characterization is a mass of historical evidence and even the State Department's own words. In the State Department's International Boundary Study No. 14 (revised 1965) on "U.S.-Russia Convention Line of 1867", the language is very clear:

"Rather than a boundary per se, this report concerns a convention line which ordinarily appears on official maps in the same manner as a boundary * * *

"Furthermore, in keeping with the policy that the line does not constitute a boundary, the standard symbol for the representation of an international boundary should never be used."

So far, the State Department has failed to explain how the United States has relinquished its claim to the islands and seabeds between 1965 and 1984. No treaty, agreement, or other public understanding had been cited for this surrender of American sovereignty.

Even as late as 1978 the noted authority Dr. William E. Butler, Professor of Comparative Law at the University of London, wrote in the book International Straits of the World, Volume 1 "Northeast Artic Passage as follows: "The Russo-American Convention Line of 1867 is not regarded as a state frontier, and the continental shelf boundary in the Chukchi Sea and northward remain to be negotiated."

The five Arctic Alaskan Islands—Wrangell, Herald, Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette—were never considered in the purchase of Alaska. Four has not yet been discovered in 1867. Americans discovered and claimed them on Arctic expeditions in following decades. Herald Islands was discovered and claimed by the British in 1849, and was later acquired by the United States.

Bennett, Henrietta, and Jeannette Islands were discovered and claimed by U.S.N. Commander George Washington DeLong aboard the Jeannette in the 1879-81 expedition. The islands still bear his name (the DeLong Islands), and the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis has a monument to that expedition.

Wrangell Island, the largest of the five with an area of 2,800 square miles (the size of Rhode Island and Delaware combined), was discovered and claimed on August 12, 1881, by Captain Calvin Leighton Hooper aboard the U.S. Revenue Marine (Coast Guard) ship Thomas Corwin. Among the landing party on Wrangell Island was the famed explorer John Muir, who wrote of his trip in the book. The Cruise of the Corwin. Various surveys, expeditions, and settlements were made on Wrangell Island in the next four decades by Americans. This ended when the Soviet Union invaded the island with a landing of infantry from the ship Red October on August 20, 1924, and took as prisoners the 14 Americans of the Lomen Brothers Company's fur settlement and confiscated all the gear, pelts, and other property. The 12 surviving Americans were eventually released from their imprisonment in Vladisvostok. the Soviets currently maintain slave labor camps on the island.

It is significant to note that in the State Department's reissue of the book Digest of International Law by Green Haywood Hackworth in 1973, the unequivocal settlements is made:

"The United States has not relinguished its claim to Wrangell Island."

Numerous efforts by various parties, including the owners of Wrangell Island, have been made over the decades to take back their property and collect damages for the unlawful occupation by the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, the State Department has not seen fit yet to honor those claims or even the decision by the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission in 1959 in favor of the Lorne Brothers.

"This impending giveaway of the five islands and the enormous tracts of oil-rich outer continental shelf to the Soviets demands the most searching public scrutiny and debate. It must be made in issues for a national decision-making," Olson stated. "The State Department is not empowered to surrender American real estate and seabeds. Only the Congress has that power. It must be brought up in the form of a treaty, signed by the President, and debated and ratified by the Senate in order to receive the full force of law. The Constitution cannot be ignored in this potentially massive cession of strategic American interests so close to home."

In an ironic comparison with the apparent lenient attitude that the State Department has exhibited toward the Soviets over the seabed boundaries, the State Department has adopted a hardline position toward our ally Canada in the Arctic. This position came to light with the leasing on August 22 of the Diapir Field which borders Canada. The Federal Register announcement of July 23, 1984 (p 29726) noted a "Jurisdictional Dispute" with Canada over some of the blocks being offered. Although the notice did not say so explicitly, the U.S. position is that the seabed boundary should reflect the requidistant" theory of boundaries, while this dispute continues, the three petroleum companies which bid on these leases (Union Oil Co. of Calif., Amoco Production Co. and Shell Western E & P Inc.) will have their bid money deposit lie in escrow. Their total winning bids for the four blocks totalled $6,105,000—a substantial affirmation of the rich nature of the Arctic Alaskan outer continental shelf.

SENATE RESOLUTION 21—RELATING TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE UNITED STATES-CANADA FREE-TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 21

Whereas Canada and the United States maintain the largest bilateral trading relationship in the world, exceeding $180,000,000,000 in 1988;

Whereas Canada and the United States first signed a free trade treaty in 1854, even before Canada's independence from Great Britain;

Whereas as a result of the hostilities created by the United States Civil War, the 1854 treaty was abrogated by the United States in 1865;

Whereas efforts to restore free trade between Canada and the United States in the 1870's, 1880's, and the 1890's failed to produce an agreement;

Whereas as subsequent effort produced a treaty in 1911, but the Canadian Government of Prime Minister Sir Wilfred Laurier was defeated in an election that determined Canada would not ratify the treaty;

Whereas Canada and the United States were leaders in the formation in 1947 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which promotes the liberalization of world commerce;

Whereas Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which permits the negotiation of free trade area agreements between contracting parties, was drafted against the background of further negotiations between Canada and the United States in 1947 on a possible free trade agreement;

Whereas Canada and the United States successfully implemented an agreement in 1965 that liberalized bilateral automotive products trade;

Whereas on March 17, 1985, President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney met in Quebec City and established the goal of a more secure bilateral trade relationship;

Whereas on September 26, 1985, Prime Minister Mulroney announced that Canada would pursue a free trade agreement with the United States;

Whereas on December 10, 1985, President Reagan notified the Congress of his intent to seek an agreement with Canada under the "fast track" negotiating authority and the Committee on Finance of the Senate agreed to such authority in a 10 to 10 vote on April 23, 1986;

Whereas on Janaury 2, 1988, the agreement was signed by President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney;

Whereas on September 19, 1988, the Senate passed the implementing legislation by a vote of 83 to 9;

Whereas after an electoral victory by the Progressive Conservative Party of Prime Minister Mulroney on November 21, 1988, the House of Commons and Senate of Canada adopted legislation to implement the free trade agreement; and

Whereas the United States-Canada Free-Trade Agreement became effective on January 1, 1989; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

Whereas

(1) President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney are recognized and commended for their great leadership and courage for signing an agreement that culminates over a century of effort to restore bilateral free trade;

(2) the United States negotiators of the free trade agreement with Canada, including Clayton Yeutter, James Baker, Peter Murphy, and William Merkin, deserve the sincerest congratulations and gratitude of the people of the United States for their successful efforts; and

(3) the Federal Government and its agencies should undertake an effort to educate and assist businesses and individuals in the United States to take full advantage of the commercial opportunities provided by the implementation of the historic free trade agreement with Canada.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the term historic is often overused. Particularly, here in the Senate. But that is precisely the nature of the free trade agreement with Canada that became effective on January 1, 1989. In my view, it is the most important bilateral free trade agreement in history, and I rise today to introduce a resolution that recognizes its importance and those, including President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney, who were responsible for its negotiation.

The saga that has brought us to the January 1 implementation was difficult. It was also long.

Ultimately, the question of implementation involved an election in Canada, after the appointed Senate of the Canadian Parliament refused to act upon the Canadian implementing legislation.

Not since the British constitutional crisis of 1909 to 1911 has an unelected body of a Parliament blocked such a major legislative program of a House of Commons. Rather than surrender his program to a veto by the House of Lords, Primer Minister Asquith called an election in 1910, and he was returned to power. In the end, the House of Lords capitulated rather than risk having their power diminished further.

The Canadian public followed the British precedent when they returned Mr. Mulroney to office with a majority government on November 21, 1988. As a result, the Canadian House of Commons and Senate adopted the necessary legislation, and the free trade agreement has become a part of history.

The primacy of the free trade agreement in Canada's political debate underlines its profound nature—and its significance to that most important country in the world to us—Canada.

I had the honor of making the motion to report the legislation from the Finance Committee that implemented the free trade agreement with Canada. As the second ranking member of the Finance Committee, I battled long and hard to keep this process moving. In the end, I even had to assure Canadians during their election campaign that under no circumstances would this trade agreement impinge on the nature of their or our social welfare programs.

In reality, this free trade process was initiated over 100 years ago.

Consider that in 1954—even before the independence of Canada from Great Britain—the Governor General of Canada, Lord Elgin, and William L. Marcy, the United States Secretary of State and a former Governor of New York, negotiated a reciprocity treaty. In fact, the initiative for the treaty was launched by President Millard Fillmore in late 1852. Who says tha Fillmore, the lawyer from Buffalo, did little of significance?

The treaty was passed, but the United States abrogated it in 1866, largely because of antagonisms sparked by Great Britain's conduct during the Civil War.

New efforts at a treaty were made in 1871. This time Secretary of State Hamilton Fish, also a New Yorker, was responsible for the negotiations. A draft treaty failed to obtain Senate interest or ratification in 1875, and not long thereafter Canada adopted the highly protectionist "National Policy."

Sporadic interest in free trade again surfaced in the 1880's and 1890's. But the next serious effort was in 1911. An agreement was negotiated in a matter of weeks. This time the Congress was enthusiastic about the agreement—perhaps a bit too enthusiastic. The Speaker of the House, Champ Clark, announced that in his view the agreement was the best way to ensure that the American flag would fly over Canada.

Fear of domination and the new resistance of Canadian manufacturing industries that had grown up behind the high tariffs of the National Policy caused the Laurier government to fall and be defeated over the proposed agreement.

Indeed, the political courage of Prime Minister Mulroney to embark upon the course of free trade given this lesson of Canadian history makes this agreement all the more dramatic.

But, as if this history were not enough, there is more. We must recall that in the wake of the protectionism of the Great Depression, it was Canada and the United States which led the way toward renewed liberalization.

The steps were small at first, tariff agreements in the 1930's and a farm implements agreement during the war.

However, as the GATT system of open trade emerged in 1947, Canada and the United States again considered the possibility of a broad free trade agreement. This time the negotiations were in secret, to avoid the political sensitivity in Canada. They failed at the last minute.

But, they left an important legacy: Article XXIV of the GATT. The same article on free trade areas that forms the basis of this agreement in 1989, some 40 years later. Article XXIV was initially drafted with the possibility of a U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement firmly in mind.

Not long thereafter, Canada and the United States did negotiate in 1964 a sectoral free trade agreement in automotive products. It was partly the succeess of this experience that gave Canadians the confidence to negotiate the comprehensive agreement that is now in place.

The latest effort emerged out of the Shamrock Summit between President Reagan and Prime Minister Mulroney in March 1985. By September 1985, Prime Minister Mulroney had decided to proceed toward a full scale free-trade agreement, and the President notified the Congress of his intent to begin negotiations in December of the same year.

However, the Senate almost rejected fast track authority for the negotiations, when the Finance Committee voted 10 to 10 on whether to proceed. In this case, the tie fortunately failed to stop the negotiations. But concerns about lumber subsidies and other annoyances with the administration almost caused this initiative to be stillborn. Chief among them was the worst trade deficit in history.

Fortunately, the negotiations proceeded, and ultimately succeeded. But not before a dramatic staged walkout by the Canadian delegation and some frantic last minute drafting to complete the agreement before the President's negotiating authority expired last January.

Still, politics once again threatened to undermine congressional approval of the agreement. First, because a number of Members felt their States have something to lose in the agreement. It could hardly be an agreement if there were not some losers to go along with the vast number of winners.

And second, because Members were upset by the initial veto of the Omnibus Trade bill over plant closing notification. The resulting resentment was seen to threaten congressional approval of the free trade agreement with Canada.

However, I always believed that cooler heads would previal. The President accepted both the plant closing legislation and the omnibus trade bill. And the Congress voted overwhelmingly to implement the free-trade agreement, and ratify more than a century of effort.

Even so, we had to await the outcome of contending political forces in Canada. In the end, the Canadian people boldly chose the agreement, rather than rejecting it and adding one more example of failure to the historic record.

After all, this agreement is positive for both nations, and it is a boost for the world trading system. Indeed, the total agreement is in many ways much more significant than the sum of its parts.

We cannot too often remind ourselves that there is no country in the world more important to us than Canada. We share the world's longest undefended border, and a profound commonality of goals and aspirations. Not to mention the world's largest trading relationship.

We export more to the Province of Ontario alone than we do to Japan. Our two-way trade of $180 billion in 1988 was roughly equivalent to the entire GDP Of the Netherlands, or one-third the entire GDP of Canada.

Thus, although we are as interdependent as two nations can be, we must be careful to recall that our relationship with Canada cannot be overlooked. It needs the same attention and work as any other—perhaps more. The agreement before us recognizes our need to build on this most important relationship.

The main elements of the agreement are now probably well known. Tariffs will be eliminated over 10 years. And since Canadian tariffs average over twice those of American tariffs, United States manufacturers should stand to gain increased access to Canadian markets. Tariff elimination should be particularly beneficial for New York's manufacturers of computers, telecommunications equipment, textiles and apparel, furniture and automotive parts.

Canadian investment restrictions will be reduced. United States financial services companies will have greater operating opportunities in Canada. In particular, I am pleased Canada agreed to eliminate the so-called 10/25 rule, which limited the amount of foreign investment in financial services firms. For New York companies, we forsee further success in banking, insurance, and other services.

The agreement also ensures long-term, nondiscriminatory access to Canadian energy supplies. Access to inexpensive Canadian hydroelectric power will significantly reduce energy costs for New York and othr States. I made it a top priority to assure that under the terms of the implementing legislation that New York's hydro imports would not be subject to any restraints on this side of the border.

Still, a number of New York interests remain to be addressed. Canadian restrictions on cultural industries are one. There was some progress. Canada did agree to protect satellite retransmissions. This means that TV stations in Buffalo and Rochester should be paid royalties for programs used by Canadian stations.

A greater North American content requirement for automotive products is another area where work remains to be done. We need a 60-percent requirement, and I hope that United States and Canadian negotiators will soon achieve such a change. We were able to insist on some modifications to the auto pact to maximize the opportunities for United States auto parts producers. And we will see to it that the Customs Service adequately enforced the rule of origin requirements under this agreement so that third countries do not inappropriately benefit.

Overall, it is a very, very fine agreement. The President, Secretary Baker, Ambassador Yeutter, Ambassador Murphy, Deputy Assistant U.S. Trade Representative William Merkin, and all of the other United States negotiators deserve much congratulations. This resolution recognizes their historic contribution. It also calls upon the agencies of the Federal Government to educate and assist United States businesses to take full advantage of the commercial opportunities provided by this agreement.

The studies I have seen, including those by the United States Department of Commerce, the New York State Department of Economic Development, and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, conclude that New York will realize significant benefits from the increased trade with Canada which surely will follow the implementation of the agreement.

New York State, as both a center of manufacturing and services exports, is in a unique position to reap the benefits of the agreement with Canada. New York City and Buffalo provide much of the approximately $20 billion in annual United States service exports to Canada. The agreement protects United States service industries against discriminatory treatment.

Meanwhile, upstate New York provides two-thirds of New York's manufactured exports to Canada, with the Rochester area, Monroe County, being the major hub. New York's manufactured exports to Canada represent over 130,000 jobs, and this number should grow under the agreement.

Still, New York industries and workers can expect some increased competition from Canada, and some adjustment will be necessary. Consequently, as I have in the past, I call upon the administration to review the adjustment needs of United States industry that will occur from the agreement, and to adopt a strategy to deal with them. A commitment to adjustment on the part of the administration remains the only method to assure long term support for trade liberalization.

In closing, let me also recognize the great leadership that New Yorkers have shown in support of the free trade agreement. It has been James Robinson, chairman of the American Express Co. of New York, that has organized the business community in support of the agreement.

The Buffalo community has also been enthusiastic about the agreement. Buffalo, I am certain, will emerge as an even greater center of investment, tourism, customs, shipping and marketing activity. This is entirely fitting. Since it was, after all, the vision of a celebrated citizen of Buffalo, President Fillmore, who in 1852 first set us on the path that has brought us to the free trade agreement that is recognized by this resolution.

Historic, indeed!

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to immediately and favorably consider this resolution.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 22—REGARDING THE AMERICAN CIVIL DEFENSE SYSTEM

Mr. SYMMS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

S. RES. 22

Whereas in this age of nuclear, energy the people of the United States are endangered by nuclear war, nuclear terrorist attacks, and nuclear accidents;

Whereas in the event of nuclear war the people are in the additional danger of starvation during the time before acquisition and food transportation can be restored;

Whereas blast and radiation shelters and food storage methods have been invented which can protect people from these nuclear dangers without evacuation;

Whereas blast and radiation shelters and food reserves have been built to protect the peoples of Switzerland, the U.S.S.R. and some other countries;

Whereas this United States Government has been established to provide for the common defense of the people;

Whereas at present no defensive blast and radiation shelters or distributed food reserves have been built for most of the people in the United States;

Whereas the Department of Defense and the Department of Agriculture have the knowledge and resources to provide this essential protection: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States Department of Defense with the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture should provide immediately to this Congress a report on a program for the building of nuclear blast and radiation shelters and for the storage of at least one year's supply of food for every civilian and every military person in the United States within walking distance of their houses and places of work.

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, when our Founding Fathers charged this Government to "provide for the common defense," they could not have known the awesome burden that charge would place upon us in this nuclear age.

The dangers of nuclear accidents or nuclear terrorist attack and the nearly unimaginable danger of nuclear war preoccupy our thoughts and inject a pervasive element of fear into all of our deliberations. These are dangers for which a "common defense" is very difficult.

Our enemies know of our fears and seek to exploit them.

Fear, however, does not relieve us of our responsibilities to our country, our people, and our oath of office. It does not relieve us of our responsibilities to posterity as today's guardians of the God-given rights of all peoples to life and liberty.

The same scientists and engineers who have given us the nuclear age have also provided us with means of defense against nuclear disaster for our homeland and our people. There are two elements in that defense—strategic defense and civil defense.

We in this Senate have been divided over the deployment of strategic defense, because it is a new and complicated subject. Certainly, we cannot be divided over the necessity to protect the American homeland.

Civil defense on the other hand, is much less complicated. The several billion dollars' worth of research which we have funded over the past 40 years has definitively proved that our people can be effectively sheltered from the effects of nuclear weapons and can be sustained in the months and years following a nuclear war. Moreover, if one terrorist, with one bomb, comes to one American city, civil defense alone could reduce the casualties by tenfold or more.

This is the knowledge that has caused the people of Switzerland, Sweden, Finland, the U.S.S.R., and the People's Republic of China to commit over 500 billion dollars' worth of resources to the building of civil defense systems and provisions.

These civil defenses have lowered those peoples' fear of nuclear disaster lowered the military danger of a preemptive first-strike and lowered the probability of war.

Today I am entering for your consideration a sense of the Senate resolution concerning civil defense. The resolution expresses our interest in this subject and asks the Departments of Defense and Agriculture to give us the information which we should have about state-of-the-art civil defense.

I believe that we shall find at least some elements of civil defense—such as the proper dispersal of our existing national grain reserves—to be sensible and economically reasonable. Other elements—such as a national shelter system—may seem to be beyond our reach. We must, in any case, have the most complete information on this subject.

Governments representing 30 percent of the people on this Earth and including those of our enemies have chosen civil defense as a primary means of assuring the survival of their people and their nations.

I am sure that you will join me in my belief that the Senate of the United States should give reasonable consideration to the relative merits of a civil defense system for the American people.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 23—RELATING TO CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISES

Mr. HUMPHREY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 23

Resolved, That (a) no Senator may accept any increase in the rate of pay such Senator receives unless the Senate has affirmatively approved such increase by a roll call vote.

(b) A Senator shall return to the Treasury any increase in pay paid to a Senator in violation of subsection (a).

SENATE RESOLUTION 24—RELATIVE TO FUTURE FUNDING FOR AMTRAK

Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. PELL, Mr. EXON, Mr. SIMON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. HEINZ, and Mr. DODD) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transporation:

S. RES. 24

Whereas Amtrak, the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, was established by the United States Congress in 1971 to assume operation of rail passenger services in this country;

Whereas Amtrak now operates 220 trains daily over a 24,000-mile route system, and also owns and controls the high speed Northeast Corridor rail line between Washington, D.C., and Boston, Massachusetts;

Whereas Amtrak has and will continue to reduce its dependence on Federal funding which has declined from $896.3 million in fiscal year 1981 to $584 million in fiscal year 1989, a reduction of over 50 percent in constant dollars;

Whereas Amtrak covers an increasing percentage of its total costs from its own revenues, and the revenue-to-cost ratio has improved from 48 percent in fiscal year 1981 to 69 percent in fiscal year 1988 and a projected 70 percent in 1989;

Whereas Amtrak revenues in fiscal year 1988 were $1.1 billion, and increase of 14 percent over 1987, which resulted from increases in transportation, real estate, mail and express, and corporate development revenues over fiscal year 1987;

Whereas Amtrak provided transportation for more than 21.5 million intercity passengers in fiscal year 1988;

Whereas Amtrak generated 5.678 billion passengers miles in fiscal year 1988 and the ratio of passenger miles per train mile (an indicator of the number of passengers riding the average train one mile) increased from 177 in fiscal year 1987 to 189 in fiscal year 1988, reflecting the increased density of passengers on Amtrak trains;

Whereas Amtrak is an ongoing business and any drastic reduction in public support, or the elimination of Federal funds, would force the corporation into bankruptcy and threaten the end of rail passenger service across the country;

Whereas the Federal, and State governments have invested heavily to modernize Amtrak facilities, purchase new rolling stock, and upgrade the high speed Northeast Corridor, which raised the value of Amtrak's net assets to over $3 billion, all of which would have to be sold at scrap value if rail passenger service were eliminated;

Whereas some 22,800 Amtrak employees in 44 States would become unemployed if the corporation received no public funds and was forced into bankruptcy;

Whereas termination of rail passenger service would trigger $2.5 billion in Amtrak liability to pay labor protection to affected employees, and if Amtrak is rendered insolvent, labor would turn to the United States Government for payment of these claims;

Whereas an Amtrak shutdown of the Northeast Corridor would drastically increase the cost, and disrupt the provision of daily commuter service by New Jersey Transit, the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Administration, the Maryland Department of Transportation, and the Massachusetts Bay Transit Authority, for the approximately 180,000 people per day who use these carriers over Amtrak owned and operated rail lines in Washington, D.C., Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, New York, and Massachusetts;

Whereas the shutdown of the Northeast Corridor would disrupt freight service provided by Conrail and other carriers on the corridor, which serve numerous businesses including General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, Dupont, General Foods, and General Electric;

Whereas Amtrak carries more than twice as many passengers between and among the Northeast Corridor stations of New York, Newark, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and Washington, than all airlines combined, and over one third of all air and rail passengers daily between Washington, D.C., and New York alone;

Whereas a shutdown of intercity rail service in the Northeast Corridor would strain already busy and overcrowded airports along the Atlantic seaboard;

Whereas Amtrak provides needed transportation for lower income and elderly travelers and serves numerous locations that have no other means of public intercity transportation;

Whereas both Amtrak's labor and management workers have made efforts to improve productivity, and as such, Amtrak will be the first railroad in this country to operate its trains nationwide under totally revised and modernized work rules;

Whereas all major industrialized Western nations have taken pride in establishing rail service and publicly funding their passenger systems;

Whereas Congress has consistently supported a balanced national transportation network, including the financial support of various modes of transportation, making this country the most mobile in the world and making travel available to persons of all income levels;

Whereas part of this balanced transportation system established by Congress has included the provision of intercity rail passenger service; and

Whereas Congress has voted numerous times to authorize and to appropriate sufficient funds to operate a national rail passenger system and has rejected efforts to eliminate Federal funding for Amtrak: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the United States Senate that—

(1) Amtrak should be supported by the Federal Government at a level that will enable it to continue to operate a national railway system and to continue the progress that has been made to improve its financial performances and service levels; and

(2) the Secretary of Transportation and the Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration should work closely with Amtrak management to—

(A) identify areas and assist in implementating changes that will further lower Amtrak's dependence on public funding without adversely affecting service; and

(B) insure that safety is given the highest priority possible as part of management's responsibility to provide rail passenger service.

SEC. 2. The clerk of the United States Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President with the request that the President further transmit copies of this resolution to the Secretary of Transportation and the Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration.

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a sense of the Senate resolution reaffirming the support of this Body for the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, better known as Amtrak. I'm pleased to be joined today by Senators SARBANES, PELL, EXON, SIMON, MOYNIHAN, GRASSLEY, BIDEN, ADAMS, BRADLEY, HEINZ, and DODD.

Mr. President, the Reagan administration will be remembered for many things. Some good, some bad. One thing this Senator, along with the millions of Americans who depend on passenger rail service, will remember is the 8-year effort to derail Amtrak.

I'm pleased to say that Amtrak has survived this onslaught. In spite of the repeated attempts of the Reagan administration to kill Amtrak, it continues to serve record numbers of passengers. Recognizing the importance of passenger rail service, the Congress has continued to find Federal funds to keep Amtrak alive.

Amtrak is a vital link in our national transportation network. To deny funds for Amtrak is to deny the importance of such a network. That's the policy the Reagan administration endorsed. It's a policy that did not make sense for the last 8 years, and doesn't make sense now.

Let's look at the facts. In 1988, Amtrak served 21.5 million people over 24,000 miles of track in 44 states. Almost 5.7 billion passenger miles were generated in fiscal year 1988, an increase of almost 9 percent over the previous year. In addition, approximately 180,000 commuters in a number of States depend on Amtrak's rails each and every day.

A major percentage of Amtrak's passengers travel in the Northeast Corridor. The importance of Amtrak in my region can hardly be overestimated. Amtrak carries more passengers among the points between Washington and New York than all the airlines combined. Carrying 3,800 passengers each day, Amtrak has become the single largest provider of point-to-point service between Washington and New York.

In my State, thousands of commuters rely on Amtrak service and facilities each day. Without Amtrak, New Jersey would face major disruption of service, or fare increases that would make rail commutation unavailable for those who need it most.

Amtrak service is an indispensible asset. Our roads and airways simply could not absorb the passenger load if Amtrak were eliminated, as has been proposed; for example, it would require over 50 additional flights each day between Washington and New York to handle those passengers now using Amtrak. It is clear that capacity just does not exist.

Amtrak is a tremendous success story. Its growth and success have come in the face of major budgetary constraints. From fiscal year 1981 to fiscal year 1988, Federal support for Amtrak fell from $896.3 million to $584 million, a 50-percent reduction in constant dollars. Yet during that time, virtually all of Amtrak's performance indicators improved. Revenues were up 14 percent in 1988, to $1.1 billion. Revenue-to-cost ratio has improved from 48 percent in fiscal year 1981 to 69 percent in 1988. And more and more riders are being served. Other Federal programs should perform so well.

In spite of all this, the final Reagan administration budget sent to the Congress again calls for the elimination of Amtrak. That would leave 21 million passengers standing on the platform, waiting for trains that wouldn't ever come. As I have before, I intend to fight this short-sighted proposal. I hope the Bush administration will take a more constructive approach, and work with the Congress, Amtrak, and its millions of passengers who depend on its existence, instead of against us.

As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, I have worked closely with Amtrak president, Graham Claytor, to make Amtrak less dependent on Federal funding while maintaining and improving service. I can assure my colleagues that Amtrak has every intention to continue these efforts, and that I will work with Mr. Claytor in this endeavor.

Mr. President, pressure on Amtrak has resulted in great savings. That progress should continue. This resolution calls for just that. It would ask the administration to work with Amtrak to make it even more efficient and reliable. It reaffirms the view of the Congress that Amtrak should remain a viable entity, and that adequate funding should be provided.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, January 22 marked the 71st anniversary of Ukraine's proclamation of independence and the 70th anniversary of the unification of the Western Ukrainian National Republic with the Ukrainian National Republic. Although this period of independence only lasted a few short years, the Ukrainian people's quest for freedom and self-determination, despite 70 years of untold suffering under Soviet domination, has not lost its original fervor and spirit.

Recent developments in Ukraine illustrate the Ukrainian people's thirst for freedom and pride in their national identity. Within the last year, Mr. President, we have witnessed a remarkable renaissance of activity in Ukraine. Numerous informal groups, with their own unofficial plublications, having sprung up during the last year calling for greater cultural, linguistic, religious, and national rights for the Ukrainian people. Activists in some of these groups have staged rallies and demonstrations that have drawn up to 50,000 people protesting repression. We have seen a revival of the still-banned Ukrainian Catholic Church with thousands of believers participating in outdoor services commemorating the millennium of Christianity in Ukraine. Even officials, particularly in the Ukrainian Writer's Union, are now calling for greater use of the Ukrainian language and for the removal of the so-called blank spots of recent Ukrainian history. These are just some examples of the resilience of the Ukrainian people and the depth of commitment to their heritage and to freedom.

Mr. President, last November, I participated in the Helsinki Commission's unprecedented human rights meetings with the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet in Moscow. During our visit, I had the opportunity to meet wfth leading Ukranian human rights activists, many of them former political prisoners. I was very impressed with their commitment and courage. Recently, some of these individuals—including Vyacheslav Chornovil, Mykhailo Horyn, and Stepan Khmara—were interviewed in an excellent and comprehensive January 22 article that appeared in the Washington Post on recent stirrings in Ukraine. I ask that this article be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I also ask that a Ukrainian Independence Day proclamation by the city of Tucson, AZ, be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

UKRAINIAN NATIONALISM STIRRING ANEW IN SOVIET "COLONY"

(By David Remnick)

"For us to lose the Ukraine would be the same as losing our head."—LENIN, 1918.

Lvov, U.S.S.R.—For the Soviet empire, the Ukraine is the fire next time. The republic may seem for now an obedient, dormant region of more than 50 million people, but it soon could pose a challenge to centralized Soviet power that would eclipse anything that has happened so far in the Baltic republics or the Transcaucasus.

Especially here in the western part of the republic—where the outlawed Ukrainian Catholic Church and cultural nationalism are strongest—a growing number of activists openly and angrily speak of themselves as a "colonized" people who intend, one day, to fight the "Soviet imperial idea." Resentment is slowly evolving into a movement.

"Right now we are not a strong movement; we don't have anything like the organization you see now in the Baltics," said Vyacheslav Chernovil, a nationalist and former political prisoner. "But a struggle is inevitable, and Moscow will invariably come down hard—much harder than they have in Estonia and Latvia."

Activists here, as well as Soviet and western sources interviewed in Moscow and Kiev, agree that the Kremlin will never show the Ukraine, a republic the size of France, even the limited tolerance it has extended to smaller, non-Slavic republics in the past year. It is a matter not only of history and politics, but of costs and benefits.

"Let's face it, the Soviet empire knows that in the end it can always survive without the Baltics or the Transcaucasus—it's only a few million people here and there, after all," said Stepan Khmara, a physician in Lvov.

"Moscow could even do without Eastern Europe, because it turns out that this is a very expensive military buffer zone. But Lenin knew it from the start: The empire cannot survive without the Ukraine. There are just too many people, too many resources here. It will inevitably be a fight. The question is: When?"

The Ukrainian challenge may not come soon, but the leadership in Moscow is still playing it safe and strict.

The Ukrainian party chief, Vladimir Shcherbitsky, is 70 years old and was one of the closest allies of the discreited Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev. And yet President Mikhail Gorbachev has kept the man known here as "The Enforcer" in place.

"Shcherbitsky is Gorbachev's iron man in the Ukraine," said Bogdan Horyn, a leader of the unofficial human rights group here, the Helsinki Union. "He may not be Gorbachev's favorite in the Politburo, but I think he fears what would happen in the Ukraine without Shcherbitsky and the mafia around him."

Knowledgeable sources in Moscow said that while Shcherbitsky will probably not last more than another two or three years, his replacement is likely to follow a similar course. "It's inconceivable that an Estonian-style party leader would get the job," one diplomat here said. "For one thing, the Ukraine doesn't have anybody like that in the ranks."

The other night in Lvov, at a dim apartment decorated with a sparse Christmas tree, a group of Ukrainian nationalists, writers and human rights workers—most of them former political prisoners—spent hours describing a place and an atmosphere never reflected in the official press.

They talked of a republic in a "perpetually worsening" economic crisis, of a Ukraine "that is still the epicenter "gutted" by decades of "imperial centralism" and "Russification." And none of the dozen men and women at the table put much faith in the slogans of reform spoken every day in Moscow or in Gorbachev himself—"a friendly-looking emperor, but an emperor, nonetheless."

And while they said they admired Ronald Reagan and his speeches during the Moscow summit, they could not understand how an American president could seemingly overlook "Moscow's domination of the periphery" and say that the Soviet Union is no longer an "Evil Empire."

"The way we see it, Gorbachev's reforms have nothing to do with internal democracy," Chernovil said. "They are a last bid—a bluff, in a way—to improve the Soviet Union's dynamics with other countries in order to get technology and aid from aborad and improve the economy."

Ivan Makar, who recently served a three-month jail sentence for nationalist activities, agreed. "Gorbachev absolutely fears real democracy," he said. "Look at the crackdown on demonstrations [that began last summer.] Look at the undemocratic road these 'elections' for the Supreme Soviet have taken. Look at how Gorbachev keeps an iron grip on the Ukraine. Even the old Stalinist constitution had more democratic phrases in it than Gorbachev's."

The movement for political and cultural autonomy in the Ukraine may not approach the scale of what happened last year in Estonia, Lativa and Lithuania, but it adds up to a great deal more than a group of people sitting around a table talking. Battles, in some places, have already begun:

Despite the lurking presence of a particularly strong KGB force in the republic, activists staged a number of mass rallies in Lvov and Kiev that have drawn between 5,000 and 50,000 demonstrators protesting political repression, "Russification" and various ecological disasters. At a June 21 rally in Lvov, 50,000 gathered in the Friendship Soccer Stadium to call for creation of an Estonian-style "Popular Front" that would press Moscow for greater economic, political and cultural autonomy.

Since Moscow decreed new restrictions on public demonstrations last July, the KGB and police have denied permission for such meetings and have used dogs and truncheons to break them up as "unsanctioned gatherings." The repression of demonstrations has been especially harsh in the Ukraine and in the neighboring republic of Byelorussia, where party officials have tried to break up the Popular Front and other democratic groups.

The Ukrainian Writers' Union, once a lap dog for Schcherbitsky and ideological orthodoxy, has become a force of opposition, supporting the nascent Popular Front and pushing for the establishment of Ukrainian as the republic's official language.

A well-known dissident literary critic, Ivan Dzyuba, was able to publish an article in the central ideological journal of the Communist Party, Kommunist, that criticizes the dominance of the Russian language and culture in the Ukraine. "We and our Byelorussian brothers are perhaps the only peoples of Europe deprived or higher education instruction in our native languages," he wrote in an article published this month in the newspaper Moscow News.

At a Writers' Union session last month, a prominent poet, Ivan Drach, spoke out openly against Shcherbitsky, the first such defiance of the Kiev leadership at an official meeting.

Although nationalists like Horyn and Chernovil have been working for Ukrainian righs for decades, many activist groups led by younger party members and independents alike have appeared in recent months.

The Lion Society, headed by a 25-year-old Young Communist League official, Orest Sheyka, has battled local authorities for the preservation of long-neglected Ukrainian monuments and natural resources, such as the Dnestr River. "The river is practically dead," Sheyka said in an interview.

Environmental groups, such as Green World and Noosfera, form a growing "Greens" movement modeled on those of Western Europe and the Baltic. At a demonstration in Kiev in November, 8,000 people gathered to attack Shcherbitsky and call on the government to shut down nuclear reactors throughout the republic.

A performance group called Don't Worry has staged many evenings of political cabaret reminiscent of neighboring Poland. And several cultural clubs, such as the Culturological Group in Lvov, are pressing the language issue and are encouraging more schools and universities to emphasize Ukranian history.

History, long and tragic, is everywhere here. Russian czars and general secretaries have dominated the region for three centuries. And nowhere in the Soviet Union does the legacy of Joseph Stalin's repression and Leonid Brezhnev's corruption persist more painfully than in the Ukraine.

Only now are historians here allowed to publish reports about the "great collectivization" of the countryside in the early 1930s, during which millions of Ukrainian farmers were forcibly herded off their lands, sent to labor camps and starved to death during an artificially created famine.

Only now are journalists here beginning to write about how Stalin crushed the Ukrainian Catholic Church in 1946, killing thousands of priests and believers and forcing millions to choose between atheism and the "officially sanctioned" and government-controlled Russian Orthodox Church.

But even now it is impossible here to write about the way Brezhnev and Shcherbitsky purged the intelligentsia in the 1970s and stacked every level of the Ukrainian party organization with complaint appartchiks—a situation that lingers today.

"We look at a place like Estonia with astonishment," said Bogdan Horyn's brother, Mikhail. "We see there Communist Party officials who actually are working in the interests of the people, and then we look at the Ukrainian party and we despair. The party holds nothing for us. It never has."

There have been nationalist, dissident movements here since the early 1960s. More than 24 years ago, Ivan Dzyuba wrote an essay on Moscow's nationalities policy, "Internationalism or Russification?", in which he called for the sort of autonomy that is at the center of the present-day Estonian platform.

Those dissidents even received some limited support from Petro Shelest, the former Ukrainian party chief, who wrote a book supporting the preservation of Ukrainian language and culture. But when Brezhnev purged Shelest in 1972, he replaced him with Shcherbitsky and an even harder line.

Shcherbitsky, for his part, continues to infuriate activists here. He has made no significant concessions on the language issue, insisting on giving his own speeches in Russian. In one speech last month he railed against the use of glasnost, as Gorbachev's policy of openness is called, for "anti-Soviet ideas" and "national egotism."

Vitali Korotich, editor of the liberal Moscow weekly magazine Ogonyok and once a rather conservative figure in the Ukrainian Writers' Union, said, "what you are seeing, for the moment, is a standoff in the Ukraine. The leadership is tough, and independent groups are growing. My big concern is that nationalism doesn't become provincialims."

Two events have set off the renewed activistm here: Chernobyl and the political upheaval in the Baltics.

As Ukrainians have learned more about the nuclear accident outside Kiev almost three years ago, they have come to distrust the authorities more than ever. Yuri Shcherbak's remarkable two-part series on Chernobyl, published recently in the journal Youth, revealed, for many, a series of startling, often humiliating details about the disaster. "We even learned that while the leadership refused for days to tell us a word of what had happened, the children of all the Ukrainian party leadership were immediately evacuated," said historian Igor Khomin.

When Estonian intellectuals began to broaden their movement for autonomy from Moscow last year, eventually winning the support of the republic's Communist Party leadership, Ukrainians listened.

"We sent three people to Estonia to see the Popular Front congress and it seemed like a miracle," said Pyotor Kagui, a member of the organizing group for a popular front in Lvov. "We knew we needed the same thing here."

But in spite of the mass demonstrations in the spring and summer supporting the creation of a democratic Popular Front and the obvious groundswell for change in the Ukraine, the authorities have tightened control to stamp out the spread of support for nationalism or participation in the underground Ukrainian Catholic Church.

At a number of factories, for example, directors have called in foremen and workers for meetings with the following sort of dialogue:

"Do you want a vacation this year?"

"Yes."

"Would you like a raise?"

"Yes."

"Do you need to take Christmas off?"

"Uh . . . no."

At the Progress shoe factory, activists here said, workers were "asked" to sign petitions disavowing participation in nationalist groups. "They know that if they don't go along, there will be trouble," Bogdan Horyn said.

The sense of psychic and political distance from the Baltics is immediately apparent. While in the Baltics, conversations, even with party leaders, are extraordinarily open and fearless, meetings here between nationalists and visiting foreigners are only comfortable on park benches and remote sidestreets. "The old days are still the new days in the Ukraine," Chernovil said.

Victor Morozov, a popular singer and director of the Don't Worry cabaret group, said that while life is slowly changing even in Lvov and there is less fear about performing his political songs on stage, "The sense of how far to go is always within us."

STALIN "WANTED US TO BECOME RUSSIANS AND TO WORSHIP A RUSSIAN GOD"

(By David Remnick)

LVOV, U.S.S.R.—Ivan Hel has been waiting to pray without fear since 1946, the year Joseph Stalin dictated that the Ukrainian Catholic Church must "liquidate itself." An activist for his underground faith, the chairman of the church's defense committee for believers, Hel has spent 18 of his 52 years locked away in Soviet jails and labor camps.

"Until the church becomes legal, I will pray right here with priests and friends. Right here at this table; this is our altar," he said at his apartment recently. "They thought they could order us to disappear, but they were wrong."

Hel and western church sources estimate that there are 4 million Catholic believers in the western Ukraine, as well as 2.5 million Ukrainian Catholics in the United States, 700,000 in Canada and many thousands more in Brazil, Australia, Poland and elsewhere. "Our center is Lvov, but we are like the Jews—a people in diaspora," Hel said.

The authorities, since the rise of Mikhail Gorbachev to power in March 1985, have eased some of the pressure on Catholics here, often overlooking large outdoor masses in villages. But hard-liners still fear the legalization of the church, since it is so tied to the question of Ukrainians' self-awareness and differentiation from Russians.

The history of the church's suppression here has been brutal. In an effort to centralize every aspect of Soviet life, Stalin outlawed Byzantine-rite Ukrainian Catholics, ordering them to "unite" under the umbrella of the Russian Orthodox Church. He severed the Ukrainian church's 350-year-old tie with the Vatican.

More than 2,500 priests were arrested. They either died in labor camps or returned home as invalids. Churches were destroyed or turned over to the Russian Orthodox Church, which has long been tightly controlled by the state.

"Stalin tried to kill our historical memory, our traditions, our faith and our spiritual culture," Hel said. "He wanted us to become Russians and worship a Russian God or no God at all."

Somehow, despite all the repressions over 43 years, the Ukrainian Catholic Church has persisted. Priests train for three years in underground seminar classes that move from apartment to apartment to avoid the local KGB. Masses are held in kitchens, basements, wheat fields.

Meanwhile, the Ukrainian Catholic cardinal at the Vatican and Ukrainian Catholics in the West have long pressed for the legalization of the church in the western Ukraine.

This decade has been one of hope for Ukrainian Catholics: The rise of the Solidarity movement in neighboring Poland and the election of a Slavic pope, John Paul II, have focused attention on the issue. The pope did not attend last year's Kremlin-sponsored celebration of the millennium of Christianity in the region, reportedly because he did not want to offend the large Catholic populations in Lithuania and the Ukraine.

Shortly before the millennium, two underground bishops and a group of nuns, priests and laymen sent a message to the pope, saying, "We consider it useless to remain underground and therefore ask Your Holiness to promote by all possible means the legalization of the Ukrainian Catholic Church in the U.S.S.R."

In a subsequent message to "Ukrainian Catholics on Their Millennium," the pope said in Canada that he spoke "as a brother Slav, sharing to a large degree your spirit and heritage."

Last summer, representatives from the Russian Orthodox Church and the Vatican met in Helsinki to discuss the matter, but very little appears to have come out of the session. Activists here said they are hoping that Gorbachev will make a trip to Rome as early as this spring—a trip that might lead to a meeting with the pope and deal with legal recognition of the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

In a republic where the Soviet hard line has been the custom, it was a sign of hope for believers several months ago when they came across an astonishing article in the atheist journal Man and the World by Vladimir Tencher of Kiev State University's Department of History and Theory of Atheism.

"As seen by much of our youth," he wrote, "atheism has simply become old-fashioned. It is the view of grandfathers and grandmothers."

Gorbachev has promised a new, more liberal law on religious practices in the Soviet Union, but Hel and other activists are waiting to see if that law will embrace their own cause.

"I don't think Gorbachev in his heart wants to do it," Hel said. "He is the product of an imperial, totalitarian system, and his reforms will only strengthen his power and the power of the system. My optimism comes from elsewhere—from the faith of our people and the pressure and moral support of the world outside."

CITY OF TUCSON,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, January 22, 1989, will mark the 71st Anniversary of the proclamation of the free and independent Ukrainian National Republic; and

Whereas, the young Ukrainian National Republic fell in 1920 as the first victim of Communist Russia and for more than half of a century Ukraine has suffered untold persecution, man-made famine, religious oppression and outright linguistic genocide in the form of Russification; and

Whereas, the people of Ukraine in 1986 experienced untold sufferings for generations to come from the nuclear disaster at Chornobyl which was under Moscow's control; and

Whereas, on April 23, 1988, the U.S. Commission on the Ukraine Famine reported its findings that the Great Famine of 1932-33 was premeditated genocide against Ukrainians perpetuated by Joseph Stalin and those around him; and

Whereas, on this occasion, it is appropriate to reflect upon our perception and understanding of the Ukrainian people and their aspirations; and

Whereas, today's celebration salutes the determination of the people of Ukraine to live in freedom,

Now, therefore, I, Thomas J. Volgy, Mayor of the City of Tucson, Arizona, do hereby proclaim Friday, January 20, 1989, to be Ukrainian Independence Day in this community, and urge all of our citizens to join those of Ukrainian descent in prayers for peace and freedom throughout the world.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the City of Tucson to be affixed this 20th day of January 1989.

THOMAS J. VOLGY,
Mayor.

DONNA HALL

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, as you know, from time to time I bring to the attention of my colleagues, the story of individuals who dedicate their time to help others. Today, I would like to insert into the RECORD an article from the Lexington Herald-Leader which recognizes the volunteer service of Mrs. Donna Hall. Mrs. Hall was recently awarded the Kentucky Governor's Volunteer Activist Award for 1988 and was named "the Citizen of the Year" by the Herald-Dispatch newspaper in Huntington, WV.

Mrs. Hall received these honors because of the many hours she has dedicated to volunteer efforts in a wide variety of civic endeavors. Numerous educational and civic organizations, including the Huntington Museum of Art, Our Lady of Bellefonte Hospital, the Kentucky Arts and Crafts Foundation, the Prichard Committee for Academic Excellence, the Kentucky Education Foundation and the Kentucky Opera, have benefited from Mrs. Hall's unselfish service. While Mrs.

Hall volunteers her time to several organizations, she is particularly interested in working with education specifically focusing on its relation to the arts. When asked about her volunteer work Mrs. Hall stated, "I feel very strongly that in order to have a successful community, State or Nation, you must have an educated population."

I hope that all of my colleagues in this body will take note of Mrs. Hall's outstanding achievements.

I ask that the article to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ASHLAND WOMAN HONORED FOR CIVIC WORK

It was Christmas all through December for Donna Hall of Ashland, wife of John R. Hall, Ashland Oil Inc. chairman and chief executive officer.

Last month, Mrs. Hall, 44, was named a recipient of the Kentucky Governor's Volunteer Activist Award for 1988. She also was named the Citizen of the Year by the Herald-Dispatch newspaper in Huntington, W.Va., for her leadership and volunteer efforts in a wide variety of tri-state and statewide services.

Named with her in the newspaper award was Philip E. Cline, 55, vice president and treasurer of J.H. Fletcher Mining Machine Co

Mrs. Hall served on the boards of the River Cities Cultural Council, the Needlework Guild of America, Our Lady of Bellefonte Hospital, the Huntington Museum of Art, the Kentucky Arts and Crafts Foundation, the Prichard Committee for Academic Excellence, the Kentucky Education Foundation and the Kentucky Opera. She is a patron of the American Council for the Arts.

Mrs. Hall is particularly interested in working with education, especially in relation to the arts. The Halls were married in 1980. Both had been widowed when they met in Chicago while he was there on a business trip. Mrs. Hall was born in Houston and grew up in Macon, Ga. She is a graduate of the University of Georgia.

The governor's award was presented by Martha Wilkinson, wife of Gov. Wallace Wilkinson, at a special ceremony at the Governor's Mansion. The newspaper award will be made this month at a banquet.

Mrs. Hall described the awards as special Christmas gifts and said of her volunteer work: "I feel very strongly that in order to have a successful community, state or nation, you must have an educated population."●

MOTHER MARIANNE OF MOLOKAI

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, last year, I nominated Mother Marianne of Molokai to the National Women's Hall of Fame as a tribute to her brave and generous service as a nurse and hospital administrator. I was particularly moved by her work among the Hansen's disease patients on the island of Molokai in Hawaii. At a time when women's talents as administrators were largely ignored, and when lepers were shunned and isolated, Mother Marianne moved from the State of New York to Hawaii to care for a community of patients afflicted with Hansen's disease. In Hawaii, she established schools and two hospitals, giving special attention to afflicted women and children.

Our ongoing experience with AIDS has demonstrated how easily contagious diseases can ignite our fears and prejudices, and how cultural differences can impede human compassion. Mother Marianne was not deterred by the vast language and cultural differences that separated her from the people of Hawaii and the residents of the settlement on Molokai. She faced and overcame hostility directed toward her as a women in a position of authority and as a stranger to the ways of the islands. She also demonstrated a willingness to work with those outside of her faith in order to ease the suffering of ill and disabled people.

The faith and courage of Mother Marianne remind us that our Nation's strength and accomplishments are in part the results of the quiet sacrifices of men and women of conscience determined to devote their skills to the welfare of others. I hope that her example inspires us to be more open and more appreciative of the contributions of all of our people.●

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on January 22, 1918, the proud and strong people of Ukraine threw off the chains of oppression and established their independence. One year later the Ukranian Rada passed the Act of Union, uniting all the territories of the Ukraine into one nation, an action inspiring hope in all who cherish freedom.

In honoring the brave Ukrainian patriots of 70 years ago it is fitting that we also pay tribute to those who, against enormous and often life-threatening odds, continue their quest for human liberty. It has been more than a decade since 10 courageous Ukrainians joined together, despite constant harassment and intimidation, to monitor compliance with the Helsinki Accords by forming the Ukranian Helsinki Monitoring Group.

Among those whose lives have been dedicated to the quest for freedom and who serve as an example to all of us are Iosyp Terelia and Danylo Shumuk, who served combined sentences of more than 60 years in prison for their human rights activities. Both left the Soviet Union and came to the West to tell their stories, and have received special recognition by Americans for Human Rights in Ukraine, the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and Amnesty International. However, others are still incarcerated without cause inside psychiatric facilities; and other suffer in silence and anonymity.

At the same time that we recognize the heroism and personal sacrifice of those being persecuted in their quest for liberty, we must give special recognition to the outstanding accomplishments of those who have brought that same spiritual strength and the rich Ukrainian heritage, here to the United States. The large and active Ukrainian-American community in the United States has made an invaluable contribution to the cultural and economic development of our country through participation in the arts, sciences, politics, business, and other endeavors. We in Maryland are proud to have an active community of Ukrainian-Americans who have enriched our State tremendously with their profound ties to family, church, and community, their hard work, and their involvement in public service.

As we reflect on the accomplishments, hopes, and dreams of Ukrainians everywhere, we must renew our pledge to speak out on behalf of those who still lack the most basic human rights and freedoms. Last year's celebration of the millenium of Ukrainian Christianity, an anniversary of great historical and religious significance, renewed the commitment of all Ukrainians to freedom of religious expression, including that the Ukrainian Catholic Church. The abiding strength and courage of the Ukrainian people give us hope for a brighter future.●

UNITED STATES CONGRESS AND WEST GERMAN PARLIAMENT EXCHANGE PROGRAM

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, since 1983 the United States Congress and the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, have conducted an annual exchange program in which staff members from both legislatures observe and learn about the workings of each other's political institutions first hand.

This exchange program is one of several sponsored by both pubic and private institutions in the United States and West Germany to foster better understanding of the institutions and policies of both countries.

This year, eight congressional staff members will be selected to visit Germany over the Easter recess period. They will spend about 10 days in Bonn attending meetings conducted by members of the Bundestag, Bundestag staffers, and representatives of political, business, labor, academic, and media institutions. Participants will spend a weekend in the district of a Bundestag member.

A comparable delegation of Bundestag staffers will come to the United States in late June for a 3-week period. They will visit congressional districts over the Fourth of July recess.

Participants should be experienced Hill staffers so that they can contribute to the success of the exchange on both sides of the Atlantic. The Bundestag sends senior staffers to the United States and a number of high ranking members of the Bundestag take the time to meet with our staffers. The United States has tried to reciprocate.

Therefore, participants should have a demonstrable interest in, if not some direct responsibility for, political, security, trade, or environmental issues as they relate to Europe in general and Germany in particular. In addition, U.S. participants will be expected to help plan and execute the program for the Bundestag staffers when they visit the United States. Participants should expect to conduct informative seminars for the Bundestag staffers and host one or two staffers in their Member's district over the Fourth of July.

Applications for participation in the United States delegation will be reviewed initially by the congressional staff group on German-American Affairs. Final selection of the delegation will be made by the U.S. Information Agency.

Senators and Representatives who would like a member of their staff to participate should direct them to submit a resume and statement of qualification to Bob Maynes, Office of Senator DECONCINI, 328 Hart Senate Office Building. Applications should be received no later than Wednesday, February 15.

I urge my colleagues to give serious consideration to this outstanding program.●

"BABE" BUXTON

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, every year on Flag Day, June 14, I think of my good friend Claiton Buxton. "Babe" Buxton was born 80 years ago June 14, 1908. He is one of the fortunate people who gets to celebrate both his birthday and Flag Day.

Babe has been in State service since May 1931, starting in the highway department. From 1940 to 1949 he worked in the purchasing department and in 1949 was elected sergeant at arms of the Vermont General Assembly, a post he held until 1961. He was made director of State buildings from 1961 to 1967. From 1967 to 1976 he was coordinator of construction for the Vermont State Colleges.

For 27 years Babe served as town moderator for the town of Plainfield and held the post of town auditor for 20 years. In addition, Babe served as justice of the peace for over 15 years.

In 1947, Gov. Ernest Gibson created the Old Vermont State Building Council, on which Babe served until 1961. He also served on the Hospital Construction Council for over 15 years.

Babe is the father of two children and the grandfather of three, and is married to the former Albas Loati.

Babe and Albas have been special friends of the Leahy family from the time I was a child. Some of my fondest memories are times when the Buxton family and my parents, Howard and Alba Leahy, and my brother, sister and I would get together with our good friends the Edsons and picnic throughout central Vermont. As children, we considered Babe's constant sense of humor and willingness to tell jokes a special treat. In fact, I know of no Vermonter with a greater store of humor than Babe.

We in the Leahy family have always cherished our relationship with Babe and Albas, and I just wanted to note this special Vermonter for my colleagues here in the Senate.●

FRANKLIN FAIRBANKS MEDAL AWARDED TO FORMER SENATOR ROBERT T. STAFFORD

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to announce that our recently retired friend and colleague, Senator Robert T. Stafford, has recently received the first annual Franklin Fairbanks Medal, an award presented by the Fairbanks Museum in St. Johnsbury, VT. The Fairbanks Museum has been operating in Vermont's beautiful, rural northeast kingdom since 1891 as an institution dedicated to teaching people of all ages about our natural surroundings. The new Fairbanks Medal is aimed toward individuals exemplifying "lifelong creative and dedicated service to the arts, sciences, or humanities" in Vermont.

I can think of no more worthy first recipient than Bob Stafford. He sets a high standard for future award winners with a distinguished record of public service, especially in the areas of educational and environmental protection. He has helped make and keep Vermont a special place.

Bob Stafford, throughout his long and distinguished career, has been a champion of educational institutions like the Fairbanks Museum. Environmental awareness and a commitment to protecting our natural surroundings and educating our people, themes which are central to the Fairbanks, have been at the heart of his work. Vermont and the Nation will profit far into the future from the environmental protection and education legislation that he worked so hard to pass.

Bob Stafford recognized that individuals, corporations, and governments must act as stewards of our air, water, and land, protecting and preserving them for future generations. As a member and chairman of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works, he was a leader in the fight to protect our environment who displayed a vision and a tough preserverance that we in this body came to appreciate and admire.

I salute the Fairbanks Museum, a venerable Vermont institution, for its wise selection. And I once again congratulate my friend Bob Stafford on winning the first Franklin Fairbanks medal, and thank him for his long and continuing service to Vermont and the Nation.●

LEGISLATIVE AGENDA OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the 100th Congress I summarized the activities of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs over the preceding 2 years. The record of achievement of the committee, and indeed the Congress, on legislation affecting Indian affairs was dramatic. Major legislation was enacted in the areas of health, housing, education, and economic development. Three bills were enacted resolving claims of Indian tribes to western water, and one was enacted resolving management of water and claims to land in the State of Florida. Many other tribal specific bills were considered. In all, some 84 bills were referred to the Select Committee and 28 were signed into law, either as freestanding statutes or as part of other legislation.

Despite this record of accomplishment, much remains to be done. As I noted at the beginning of my summary last year, during my term as chairman of the Select Committee in the 100th Congress, I traveled to almost every part of Indian country, I have seen the sometimes appalling conditions in which many native people are forced to live. I have seen raw sewage being dumped into drinking water sources, Indian housing and Navajo hogans which have no water or sanitation facilities, native villages in Alaska where the only health care provider has less than 10 weeks of training, Indian children attending schools in classrooms in South Dakota that have asbestos hanging from the ceilings, Indian communities where the rates of alcoholism and substance abuse are as high as 90 percent, epidemic proportions of teenage suicide, and a crisis shortage of physicians and nurses in isolated reservation and rural areas.

Mr. President, the legislation enacted in 100th Congress has not changed these conditions. It represents but a step in the right direction.

Mr. President, in the last Congress the committee placed a high priority on legislation directed at the development of economies on Indian reservations. Many of the problems found in Indian country can be traced directly to the lack of economic opportunities—the lack of jobs. This, in turn, leads to lack of self-esteem with all of the problems that stem from this in any society—alcoholism, neglect of family and sometimes even abuse, high dropout rates from the schools, teenage suicides, and many other problems. Clearly economic development must be given a high priority by this committee and by the Congress.

In the 100th Congress we passed legislation to establish an Indian Development Finance Corporation, an institution modeled on the World Bank and designed to supplement or complement traditional sources of capital in underdeveloped areas. The President saw fit to pocket veto this legislation, contending that adequate sources of capital are available elsewhere and that this institution would duplicate existing Federal programs. I am convinced that the record shows otherwise. I intend to reintroduce this legislation in anticipation that the concept will receive more favorable consideration from the new administration.

I also intend to introduce legislation to revise what is now called the Buy Indian Act—a law that was first enacted in 1908 and amended in 1910 requiring, as much as is practicable, employment of Indian labor and purchases of the products of Indian industry. This law has, in some measure, been followed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service, and efforts have been made by the Congress to utilize the act in defense procurement. The existing law is, however, clearly outmoded and needs to be rewritten to accommodate modern circumstances.

Finally, in the area of economic development, I look forward to working with my esteemed colleague, the vice chairman of the committee, Senator JOHN MCCAIN, on legislation to provide tax and trade incentives for private investment in Indian country. I understand that this legislation is in the developmental stage but I look forward to lending my full support for this initiative.

Legislation will be introduced to provide a new regulatory framework for administrative approval of contracts between Indian tribes or individual Indians and non-Indian parties. The existing statutory authority found its inception in 1871. The most recent amendment to this framework was added in 1958. Both the judicial and the executive branches of the Federal Government have broadly construed the statutory authority so that its implementation has become unwieldy and intrusive on tribal self-government.

In the last Congress the Select Committee considered legislation to amend the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. In the course of the hearings it became clear that there have been problems in the implementation of this act and that some legislation is desirable. Nevertheless, the bill before us was flawed and it did not move forward. I anticipate the development of a new bill—one which will add a child protection component to the bill—and look forward to the introduction of this new bill early in this session of the Congress.

Late in the last Congress, at the request of the administration, legislation was introduced to amend the Indian Civil Rights Act to expand the jurisdiction of Federal courts to review the actions of the governments of the Indian tribes. This legislation would not only overturn a 1978 Supreme Court decision, Santa Clara Pueblo versus Martinez, strongly affirming the sovereign rights of the Indian tribes, it would also condition the recognition of the actions of tribal courts on a restructuring of tribal governments to establish independent judiciaries, and, for the first time, provide authority for the Attorney General to bring actions directly against the governments of the tribes. The tribes strongly opposed this legislation in the last Congress and undoubtedly will strongly oppose such legislation if it is reintroduced in this Congress.

The committee recognizes the need for strengthening the judicial institutions of the tribes. In the last Congress the committee held a general oversight hearing on tribal courts. Among the recommendations the committee received were recommendations for the establishment of a National Tribal Judicial Center to provide resources for the tribal courts, the provision of legal instruction to judges and court personnel, the development of model codes and rules of procedure, to provide for the coordination with the State and Federal judicial systems, and that the Federal Government generally work toward the improvement of the tribal court systems. I anticipate a further hearing on this subject and look forward to the development of legislation to establish this institution.

In the area of Indian cultural recognition and protection of the rights of the Indian people to practice their traditional religions free of encroachment, the committee had before it last year three bills of major significance: one to establish a National Museum of the American Indian to be situated here in the Nation's Capital; a second to provide for the repatriation of skeletal remains and grave goods from their present repositories in museums to Indian people for proper interment; and a third to strengthen the provisions of the existing American Indian Religious Freedom Act. I anticipate the introduction of comprehensive legislation to address these issues.

In the area of claims settlement legislation, the committee is aware of at least 11 separate negotiations presently underway with respect to resolution of Indian claims to water. As each of these negotiations reaches fruition, congressional action will be necessary to ratify the agreements and the Select Committee, as it was in the last Congress, will be actively involved. In addition, one major claim affecting the Puyallup Tribe and the city of Tacoma, WA, is in the final stages of resolution and in all likelihood will be before the committee during this congressional session.

Legislation will also be introduced to address the problem of recognition of tribes which are not currently federally recognized and do not currently enjoy a government-to-government relationship with the United States. While tribes have, from time to time, been newly recognized by the Government during the 20th century, it was not until 1978 that the Department of the Interior, acting in response to proposed legislation, promulgated regulations to establish formal procedures for the extension of recognition to tribes which through the forces of history have been overlooked and unrecognized. Now, 10 years later, it is clear that this regulatory framework is not achieving its objective. The program office at the Bureau of Indian Affairs which is responsible for this task is inadequately staffed, the burdens imposed on the applicant groups appear excessively onerous, and the criteria for recognition is in need of examination. Consideration of this legislation will be a major activity of the committee in this session of the Congress.

Finally, a major policy initiative of the committee in the forthcoming year will be a series of oversight hearings to examine the manner in which the Department of the Interior, other Federal agencies, and the Congress have carried out the trust responsibility of the United States to the Indian tribes and Alaska Natives. This inquiry will direct itself toward the administration, protection and enhancement of natural resources, the provision of services to the Indian people, and the protection and enhancement of the governments of the Indian tribes and Alaskan Native villages.●

ANTI-DRUG ABUSE ACT OF 1988

● Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, it was just over 3 months ago that the Congress passed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. The legislation, now law, included serious new Federal drug policy initiatives. What the bill did not include was sufficient funds.

To put into effect the various treatment, interdiction, education, and enforcement proposals in the bill, the Congress authorized $2.7 billion. Yet, less than $1 billion was made available at the time of the law's enactment.

I believe we must now prove the sincerity of our actions. The request we are making today is for supplemental funds in order to carry out the promises made in the drug bill. This supplemental appropriations bill would provide the remaining $1.78 billion for fiscal year 1989.

The stakes in this war on drugs are too high. The cost to our own society is unconscionable. Reducing both the demand for and supply of drugs in our country must remain a priority and must remain on the forefront of Congress' and the administration's legislative agenda. We have already entered the battle. It is imperative that we demonstrate that we have entered the battle to win.●

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, on February 4, 1989, St. Andrew's Church in Westwood, NJ, will celebrate its centennial. I am pleased to offer my congratulations to all who have been associated with St. Andrew's during its long history.

St. Andrew's Church has a long history of providing spiritual guidance and service to its community. Since the first Mass was celebrated in 1879, St. Andrew's Church has grown to meet the spiritual needs of the community. In 1923, the St. Andrew School was opened for children through the fifth grade. Eight years later, the school was expanded to include children up to the eighth grade. In 1962, a new church was built, providing better facilities for the community.

St. Andrew's has planned a series of events to mark their centennial. I ask my colleagues to join me in wishing St. Andrew's Church continued success in the future.●

THE 150TH ANNIVERSARY OF BELLEVILLE

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer my congratulations to the town of Belleville as it celebrates its 150th anniversary.

Belleville was established as a Dutch community on the banks of the Passaic River. Originally a part of the city of Newark, Belleville became a separate community in 1839. The town has witnessed key events in American history. In was the scene of rear guard action during the Revolutionary War. Bullet holes were once visible on the spire of the Reformed Dutch Church. In 1798, the first low-pressure steam engine made in America was manufactured in Belleville. Throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, Belleville continued to share in the tremendous growth that has enveloped Passaic County. It is now a town of over 35,000 that offers a wonderful community in which to live and work.

Belleville will celebrate its 150th anniversary on January 28 with a series of special events. I join the residents of Belleville in celebrating 150 years of progress, and I extend my best wishes to them for continued success in the future.●

LOUIS H. REENS, WILTON SELECTMAN

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise to bring to my colleagues' attention an outstanding example of public service, that of Louis H. Reens, second selectman of the town of Wilton, CT. Mr. Reens has served his town for nearly 20 years in various positions. He is retiring from the selectman's post, but leaves behind a fine record of volunteerism for his community and for all of us.

In 1969, he was appointed to the planning and zoning commission of Wilton for a 2-year term, during which time he worked for innovative solutions for the town's parks, recreation and conservation commission and acted for several years as its chairman. During that time, he focused his efforts on environmental issues.

Appointed to Wilton's board of selectmen in 1979, Mr. Reens served for nearly five terms. His wise counsel and patience often cast him in the role of compromise builder and peacemaker. His leadership in the town and in the Democratic Party, long the minority in Wilton, will be sorely missed.

Working alongside Mr. Reens, his wife, Paula, has also been a strong volunteer for many years. She has worked throughout Fairfield County for more than two decades to help bring affordable housing to minorities. Through her efforts, nearly 3,000 families have found homes from Trumbull to Greenwich. The dedication to a better quality of life for their neighbors deserves recognition, and I ask that the U.S. Senate join with the town of Wilton in paying tribute to Louis and Paula Reens.●

PEARL BAILEY—AMBASSADOR AND ENTERTAINER

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, last year I had the honor of serving as a U.S. delegate in the 43d session of the U.N. General Assembly.

It was a special pleasure to serve in the U.S. delegation to the General Assembly with the reknowned Ambassador and entertainer Pearl Bailey. Ms. Bailey's concern for individual rights and her work toward peace and better understanding among the nations of the world have earned her great respect and admiration among her colleagues at the General Assembly. Her honesty and warm smile easily disarm anyone who might disagree with her. Ms. Bailey's tenacity for equal representation and fairness toward the smaller countries are a great example of her excellent diplomatic skills.

It is impossible to talk about Pearl Bailey and not mention her accomplishments as an entertainer. She made her Broadway debut in 1946 in "St. Louis Woman" and subsequently appeared in "Arms and the Girl," 1950, "Bless You All," 1950, and "House of Flowers," 1954. Her greatest success came in 1967, when she starred in the hit musical "Hello Dolly!" for which she received a Tony Award. Ms. Bailey also appeared in several films and had her own television show in 1970–71. But she is best known for her musical talents with songs like "Tired," and "Takes Two to Tango."

Mr. President, I would like to enclose a moving piece by Ms. Bailey on the subject of AIDS, the most difficult health crisis in this country and abroad. I know my fellow Senators will appreciate her compassionate remarks about this awful dilemma that we as a people face.

The article follows:

We the Seekers Shall Be the Finders

(By Pearl Bailey for AIDS)

I thought, it is not fair for you to have this disease. It is not fair for us to sit here in darkness waiting, for answers without even a clue. We need help too.

In some bosom there is faith: In some mind there is a key to open the door. We must falsify the lie that "AIDS" is "unconquerable." Somewhere in the world a man or woman will, by the grace of God, become filled with the knowledge that will save humanity.

Through our combined efforts it can and must be done if mankind is to survive this terrible pestilence. God created mankind. We must not allow "AIDS" to destroy it, or force us to destroy ourselves. The cry for help grows louder, and louder every day. Our ears must grow sharper to the sound of "HELP."

Yes, this trip is worthwhile for mankind's sake. Let us gather together often in love mankind's sake. Let us seek no reward other than life. Let us try to find the truth.

Time is not on our side. God is.

We must keep searching until we find a cure for "AIDS".

We the seekers, shall be the finders.

Today he is frightened (tho he hides it well), questioning, probing, helping others. He wonders why the doctors. Scientists, politicians, and financiers aren't doing more: anything so that he can live. The disgust about the speed and inefficiency is eating at his soul. He said in a recent letter to me, "I am not yet 30 and each day I face life with a virus inside of me that is killing almost all of my friends. I just wish someone from the 'outside' would hear it—would hear me." I call him a brave, young man, waking each day asking God, "Is this the day?"

In the Bible we read of the lepers whom men shunned: some brave souls walked among them. So many times we tend to shrug off good, able souls, thinking we can solve situations from a distance. No! my friends we must take a closer look seeing "the faces," and "the hearts." As I looked into the heart of this boy, I sometimes felt to ask, "How little friend did this occur? Can you help us so we may know more? We are trying to help you. Give us a clue as to the beginning." I remember him telling me of his first knowledge. He said, "When the doctor told me, first, I cried: then I spoke to the Priest," then he said, and he laughed, "I started to sell all my possessions." "One day," he said, "I looked around me and discovered I had sold my bed." I knew then he was telling me all. He was getting ready for death. How dare a disease prepare us in such a cruel, inhuman way.

It was a long journey here, measured more in love than distance. The realization that the world would be here to listen, speak, and search together has made it worthwhile. Hope, faith, love traveled all the way with me. The "outsider" has to become "insider," on the subject of "AIDS."

I've heard it said, "Not in this century will there be a cure." We must say, and believe: "Oh yes there will be." Each nation sitting here has been touched, not one has escaped this pestilence, "AIDS." Like the "four horsemen," is riding the earth, destroying: with no regard to age, lace, or sex. Those who say, "Not Me," think of all who said the same thing.

Let everyone cry out to God and lift his heart up to him, as if he were hanging by a hair, and a tempest were raging to the very heart of heaven, and he were at a loss for what to do, and there were hardly time to cry out. It is a time when no counsel indeed, can help a man and he has no refuge save to remain in his lonliness and lift his eyes and his heart up to God and cry out to Him. And this should be done at all times for in the world a man is in great danger." (Quote from Martin Buber.)

The recognition of "AIDS" comes closer when it strikes someone dear. I met a young boy who at 25 had reached a large degree of success. At 30, he is reaching out for "life:" "Death" is reaching out for him. He was caught in the dragnet of "AIDS."●

U.S. DISTRICT COURT JUDGE JOSEPH BLUMENFELD

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join with me in remembrance of and tribute to a great man who served the public—a witty and wise man whom I was fortunate to know. He was the late U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Blumenfeld, formerly my father's law partner in the years before my father ran for Congress. The association of an Irish-American and a Jew in a law office raised a few eyebrows in those days, but it never gave either of them a moment's pause. They were a good team; they worked hard and remained friends after their careers took them into different branches of the Federal Government. When my father became a Senator and learned of an opening on the Federal bench in Connecticut, he recommended Joe Blumenfeld's name to then-President Kennedy, who appointed him. Judge Blumenfeld became an institution in the judiciary, armed with his fiery humor, his salty impatience for ill-prepared lawyers, and above all his love of justice and the law.

One week before he died, in November, I happened to invite Judge Blumenfeld to a luncheon with other long-time friends of my father. The judge, at 84, was still working, as a senior judge. He said he could not attend because of his difficulty in getting around. We held the lunch despite his passing and talked at length about his life.

I think my colleagues will appreciate hearing the remarks delivered at Judge Blumenfeld's service by Judge Jon O. Newman:

REMARKS BY JUDGE JON O. NEWMAN

It is a privilege to speak these brief words about my dear friend, Joe Blumenfeld. His was a life dedicated to the law. For six decades he rendered service to the law—for 33 years as a practicing attorney and for 27 years as judge of the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut.

He arrived in Hartford from St. Paul, Minnesota, and the Harvard Law School. In a short time he established himself as a premier litigator, equally accomplished in the rough and tumble of the trial courts and the somewhat more subdued atmosphere of the appellate courtroom. He tried cases with the same zest and enthusiasm that enlivened every task he ever undertook. The law firm was Pelgrift, Dodd & Blumenfeld—Delancey Pelgrift, who would continue a distinguished career at the bar, Tom Dodd, who, with Joe's hard work and wise counsel, would become a United States Representative and a United States Senator, and Joe Blumenfeld, who would become one of the Nation's outstanding federal judges.

Joe was called "a lawyer's lawyer." That is said about many attorneys who earn the regard of their colleagues, but with Joe, it was more than a label; it was a recognition that he was the one they turned to to take on the tough cases. In later years, at our frequent lunches with Judge Smith, the judge he held in the highest esteem, and our law clerks, he would reminisce about those years of private practice, about trudging through the snow to courthouses throughout the state to try cases entrusted to him by other members of the bar, or to argue their appeals in Connecticut's Supreme Court. "Let me tell you about this case I tried out in Litchfield," he would begin, remembering in detail the personalities from the courtroom, the facts of the case, and especially the point of law that had engaged his quick mind. Often the story had a humorous twist. Joe could tell stories with the best of them, enjoying the punch line as much as his listeners, and getting a special kick out of those that drew a laugh at his own expense.

In the 1940s, his talents as a litigator earned him a four-year assignment as Special Assistant to the United States Attorney.

Joe Blumenfeld became a federal judge in 1961 and later served three years as Chief Judge. He was just the 16th judge in the history of the District of Connecticut. Joe ascended the federal bench with two characteristics that imbued his work—humility and pride. His humility graced his entire judicial career. He understood full well the authority of his office, but he was never afflicted with the arrogance of power. The robe did not obscure the essence of the man—the gentle wit, the radiant grin, the self-deprecating humor, the warmth of personality.

Yet the humility, genuine as it was, did not displace a pride in who he was and what he was doing. He was proud to be a judge, proud to share a responsibility for maintaining the legal traditions of the United States and defending the ultimate embodiment of American law, the United States Constitution. He took special pride in being the first Jew to become a federal judge in Connecticut. He saw it as a step in the realization of the American dream. Others saw it as well as an exemplary appointment of merit, an individual whose intellect, experience, and compassion superbly qualified him for service on the federal bench.

The promise of those qualifications was soon realized. Right from the start and throughout more than a quarter century of service in the federal judiciary, Joe Blumenfeld gained recognition as one of our great judges. He ran his courtroom with courtesy and dispatch. He presided with dignity, leavened with infectious good humor.

But it was the wisdom and scholarship of his opinions that earned him his stature as a jurist of national reputation. Ruling on a wide range of topics, he wrote with clarity and vision, authoring a number of opinions that are included in the leading law school casebooks.

Joe cared deeply about the law and the institutions of the law. He revered the law. For him, law was mankind's finest expression of the values he deeply cherished—fairness, decency, equality of opportunity, regard for the dignity of each human being.

Always the law was his guide. And the commands of the Constitution were at the core of his abiding faith in the law. A few years ago, receiving an award from the National Conference of Christians and Jews, he spoke with feeling about his reverence for the Constitution and for its guarantee of equality under law. As he spoke, the passion of his convictions welled up within this gentle man, emotion choked his voice, and tears clouded his eyes. Rarely have a heart and a mind been enlisted in such consistent devotion to such enduring principles.

When Joe was honored with the presentation of his portrait, which now adorns the courtroom in which he presided for nearly three decades, he asked himself whether, if he had the chance again to become a judge, he would do so. He answered "yes" in words of utter simplicity that were so characteristic: "The work is hard, but it is important work, it is satisfying, and I enjoy doing it."

To lawyers and to his colleagues on the bench, he was always "Judge B."—the sobriquet that neatly blended the respect he earned with the informality he preferred. To 27 years of law clerks, he was an inspiring figure, always concerned about their careers, always ready to share their joys and sorrows. The twenty assembled here today from across the country bear testament to their high regard for him. And he earned the affection and loyalty of his devoted secretary, Ellen Anderson.

There are many judges who are respected, and surely he was. There are a few who are admired, and surely he was. But rarely can it be said that a judge was loved, yet surely he was. Joe Blumenfeld enriched our lives and our law. And for that we are grateful.●

DECEPTIVE MAIL PREVENTION ACT

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join with my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, in introducing legislation which I believe is an important step in protecting postal consumers from deceptive "look-alike" mailing practices.

The bill, which we call the Deceptive Mail Prevention Act of 1989, will be referred to the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. As the chairman of the Federal Services, Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee, I am planning a subcommittee hearing on this legislation in late February. I will do all I can to see legislation of this kind, after all interested parties have been heard, advances through the committee so that the Senate can work its will on this matter.

Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is straightforward: to stop those who deceptively associate themselves with the Government by using official sounding names, seals, and insignias in commercial mailings, misleading mail recipients into thinking they are purchasing from, or contributing to, the Government. The bill declares as unmailable any letter which could reasonably be construed as implying a Government connection where none exists, unless the letter includes both on its face and on the envelope a conspicuous statement that makes it clear there is no Government affiliation with the mailer.

Examples of the kinds of mailing practices which our legislation would deter include: efforts to sell services or products actually available from the Government for free or for less than the offeror charges; offers to save personal benefits such as Social Security with a contribution of money; and the offer of Social Security lottery tickets.

As chairman of both the postal subcommittee and the Senate Aging Committee, I have a particularly unique and compelling perspective from which to view this kind of unethical mailing practice, since our elderly population is disproportionately affected by such schemes. I will not stand by while the U.S. mail, so integral a link in the communications network which binds us together as a nation, is used to prey on the elderly.

The idea for this bill is not a new or novel one, Mr. President. Senator HEINZ introduced similar legislation last Congress. His bill was the subject of discussion among committee staff during the final days of the 100th Congress. It should also be noted that the House of Representatives passed similar legislation during the last session of the 100th Congress.

Mr. President, I intend to work closely with my colleagues to see that the Congress does all it can to eliminate scam operations, which trade on the Government's name, using the U.S. mails as a vehicle for their profits. In doing so, I think we will enhance the confidence that Postal customers have in the mail and in the U.S. Postal Service. I urge my colleagues to join with us in this effort.●

IN TRIBUTE TO MAYOR DENNIS COLLINS, OF BAYONNE, NJ

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to honor one of the outstanding public figures in the State of New Jersey: the Honorable Dennis Collins, the mayor of Bayonne.

Mr. President, Mayor Collins has been mayor of Bayonne for 15 years; longer than anyone in the modern history of Bayonne. In that time, he has established himself not only as a highly competent administrator, but as a real leader in the community. His tireless efforts have touched the lives of countless residents of Bayonne.

Mayor Collins is a special man who leads a special city. His service in government began more than 25 years ago when he served as a first ward councilman. Later he was elected as councilman at large, and then president of the city council. Throughout his years in public service, Mayor Collins has consistently demonstrated his deep commitment to Bayonne and the diverse mix of people who live there. His work has been recognized not only throughout our great State, but around the country.

Mr. President, on January 27 there will be a dinner at the Hi Hat Club in Bayonne to honor Mayor Collins. At that time, many of the mayor's friends and constituents will have an opportunity to say thanks for his dedicated service to Bayonne. It should be a worthy tribute to a truly outstanding man.

The people of Bayonne are proud of Mayor Collins and they deserve to be. He represents the best of public service and the best of New Jersey. I am proud to count him as a friend, and want to extend him my most sincere congratulations and best wishes for continued success in the future.●

PASSING OF A FRIEND

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, it was with great sorrow that I recently learned of the passing of an old and very dear friend. N. Glenn Russell had for a number of years been my barber as he serviced the Brookside area in Kansas City, MO, and Glenn was always eager to discuss politics. Through the years, I came to learn that there was no better place to return and find out what issues were on the minds of Missourians than Glenn's barbershop. Not only was Glenn always in the know, but he was usually correct in his assessment of the situation. And I am not the only one who will mourn Glenn's passing. Glenn was a leader in the Brookside Merchants Association and through his and the other members efforts the area maintained a wholesome, family oriented atmosphere that served as a model for other neighborhood retail organizations within the metropolitan area. We will all miss him very much.●

BICENTENNIAL SIGNIFICANCE OF 1989

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, as the 101st Congress convenes and as the Senate prepares to vote to confirm our 61st Secretary of State, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues how historically significant this year is as the bicentennial of the creation of our Federal Government in 1789.

A number of unparalleled events took place exactly 200 years ago, in 1789—events that brought forth the creation of our Federal Government.

Each of the three branches of our Government traces its origins to momentous milestones in 1789.

I am sure that my colleagues will be fascinated by the numerous accomplishments of our Founding Fathers in that historic year.

In February 1789, George Washington was elected the first President of our Nation.

A month later, our U.S. Constitution officially went into effect.

During the first week of April that year, both the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives held their first official meetings.

Later that month, President Washington was inaugurated in New York City, our first seat of government.

During that summer, the Departments of War, Treasury, and Foreign Affairs, along with the judiciary and the position of Attorney General were established.

The Department of Foreign Affairs was renamed the State Department in September.

In October 1789, our first Chief Justice was sworn in, and President Washington nominated Thomas Jefferson as the first Secretary of State—a move confirmed by the first Members of this great body.

As a Senator from Virginia, I am particularly proud of my home State's role in the creation of our Government.

The geographical center of the then 13 coastal States—all east of the Appalachian Mountains—was only a few miles from my Middleburg home.

Virginia provided our first President; two of the executive's four Cabinet officials; one of the first five Supreme Court Justices; 2 of 24 U.S. Senators; and 10 of 59 U.S. Representatives, including James Madison, the architect of our Constitution.

In addition, Virginia later shared in contributing land for our permanent seat of government here on the Potomac.

As we approach the confirmation of our next Secretary of State, I am remined of the first: Thomas Jefferson.

He was responsible for foreign affairs and, with the exception of military and financial matters, our entire domestic administration.

Allow me to briefly outline Mr. Jefferson's responsibilities as our first Secretary of State:

Formulated and established national foreign policy;

Communicated with foreign representatives in our Nation, and with our representatives abroad;

Coordinated foreign and domestic commerce and trade;

Coordinated international and internal navigation;

Regulated Federal commissions, and the safekeeping of Federal records and the Great Seal;

Promulgated laws;

Communicated with the individual States and territories, Governors, and other Federal officials not associated with the War and Treasury Departments;

Communicated—in the absence of the Justice Department—with Judges and Marshals;

Drafted executive reports to the U.S. Congress—on such subjects as uniform weights and measures, coinage, the mint, and fisheries;

Supervised the printing of the first U.S. Census;

Administrated the first National Patent System;

Formulated the plan for the first mint;

Served as repository of publications and printed materials—the forerunner of our Library of Congress.

I also should note that Secretary Jefferson performed these duties with a staff of four and an annual budget of $8,000, which included his own $3,500 yearly salary.

This is a proud moment in American history, as we pause to pay tribute to our visionary leaders and humble origins 200 years ago.

Our legacy is best described by the words of James Madison, who wrote Thomas Jefferson in June 1789:

> The Federal business has proceeded with a mortifying tardiness * * * We are in a wilderness without a single footstep to guide us. Our successors will have an easier task * * *.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will take note of the historic significance of this bicentennial year.●

CHEMICAL WEAPONS ISSUES

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, 1988 will be remembered as a year when peace began to "break out" around the world. It was a year in which the Soviet pullout from Afghanistan began, the INF Treaty entered into force, the four-nation settlement in southern Africa was signed, and a cease-fire in the Iran-Iraq War went into effect.

Unfortunately, often overlooked is the fact that 1988 was also a year in which chemical weapons were unleased with devastating results by one government against its own citizens. This heinous act, has gradually awakened the world to the threat posed by chemical weapons.

These weapons are deadly. A very small amount inhaled or absorbed through the skin can kill within minutes or can cause a slow, agonizing death.

These weapons are indiscriminate. Poison gases can wipe out civilian populations, while on the battlefield military personnel can protect themselves from the lethal effects of these agents.

These weapons are proliferating at a rapid pace. At the start of this decade, there were four nations known to have the capability to produce chemical weapons. Today, nearly two dozen countries are believed to have joined this increasingly nonexclusive club.

These weapons are already in the hands of terrorist states such as Syria and Libya, who are not only likely to use chemical weapons but are certain to export them to terrorist groups such as the PLO and the IRA.

These weapons are cheap and relatively easy to produce. They are often referred to as the "poor man's atom bomb." But there is one enormous difference between chemical and nuclear weapons—chemical weapons are being used, nuclear weapons are not.

This is why it is imperative that the United States act quickly and forcefully to prevent further uses of chemical weapons around the world and to completely ban their production and stockpiling. We in Congress share in President Bush's desire to see that chemical weapons are "wiped off the face of the earth."

Unfortunately, not all nations share this conviction. So, as the leader of the free world, it is incumbent upon the United States to send an unmistakeable message to those nations that may contemplate using chemical weapons—that there will be a stiff price to pay.

The recently concluded Paris Conference provided a good start by focusing attention on this issue. Unfortunately, beyond stating opposition to the use of chemical weapons and affirming a committment to achieving a comprehensive ban on these weapons, the 149 nations attending the Conference were unable to achieve any consensus as to how to resolve this pressing issue. Work at the Geneva Committee on Disarmament to achieve an effectively verifiable ban proceeds, but it is slow and deliberate.

We must send an unmistakable signal now—before it is too late, before some irresponsible nation is tempted to use chemical weapons again—that such behavior will not be tolerated by the international community.

First, the United States must impose sanctions swiftly and completely against any nation that violates the 1925 Geneva protocol. Although an imperfect tool for effecting change, sanctions send a signal and in this case will carry a powerful message to transgressors. Of course, sanctions will be more effective if other nations join us, so we must work to encourage international sanctions as well.

Second, we must move swiftly to conclude a comprehensive ban on the production and stockpiling of these weapons, so that no nation will be allowed to possess any chemical weapons. Those that do will clearly be in violation of international law and will be subject to severe censure and worldwide ostracization.

Third, until chemical weapons are banned, we must coordinate efforts with our allies to tighten current export controls to include precursor chemicals and the technology associated with chemical weapons production. Efforts also must be made to bring the Soviet Union, the East bloc and the newly industrializing nations into this regime.

Finally, we must punish those nations that allow companies in their jurisdiction to supply nations with a chemical weapons capability. Governments should be held accountable for the actions of their citizens and should pay a price if they are lax in stopping prohibited practices.

These are just a few of the interim steps that we can and must take before we conclude an agreement that really does "wipe chemical weapons off the face of the Earth" once and for all.

Two bills being offered today lay a solid foundation for achieving this goal, and I am proud to cosponsor both of them. Senator PELL's bill targets chemical weapons users and mandates sanctions against those nations that engage in this abhorrent practice. His measure sends an unmistakable signal to all nations that the United States will not tolerate such behavior.

Senator DOLE's bill focuses on supplier nations—those who provide others with the ability to produce chemical weapons. It requires American vigilance on the issue of the transfer of technology and material that might provide a nation with a chemical weapons capability.

While I feel strongly that the thrust of the Dole bill is correct—any nation or company that provides such assistance should be penalized—I think it is important that sanctions be imposed equitably. We must be careful that the penalties we impose against foreign transgressors are commensurate with those that are levied against American companies that violate the Export Administration Act. If they are not, our allies will be justified in loudly protesting our sanctions. Such a "do as we say, not as we do" approach would be hypocritical and would severely strain relations. But I am confident that as the legislative process moves forward, we will guard against any such inequities.

It is only through the firm and resolute approaches taken by these two bills that the United States can send a message to the international community that we are committed to removing the blight of chemical weapons from our planet.●

MRS. CAROLINE KALINOWSKI

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a fellow Coloradan, Mrs. Caroline Kalinowski who yesterday celebrated her 100th birthday.

When she was only 16-years-old, Mrs. Kalinowski left her native Poland to begin a new life of opportunity in the United States. Although she only had the equivalent of a third grade education, Mrs. Kalinowski taught herself to read and quickly became an avid follower of current events in the New York Daily News.

After her husband was tragically killed in an explosion in a Pennsylvania coal mine, Mrs. Kalinowski supported her four children by working in a garment factory in Brookly, NY. She continued to work until the age of 72 and lived by herself until the age of 95. When she was 95 she made the decision to join her daughter Mrs. Janine Mayes in Denver, CO.

Mrs. Kalinowski is friendly, enjoys a good joke and is still politically aware. In fact, I am told that she is a fan of President George Bush and was pleased that her birthday coincided with the inaugural festivities. Mrs. Kalinowski's only regret in life was that she never obtained her U.S. citizenship. It is my hope that in her second century this wish becomes a reality. On behalf of all of the citizens of Colorado, let me extend my warmest wishes for her continued happiness.●

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

TAXPAYER SUBSIDIZATION OF LEVERAGED BUYOUTS CHALLENGED

(Mr. BENNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 615, which is an effort to do something about LBO's. Whatever Members may think about leveraged buyouts, one thing is clear: the American taxpayer should not subsidize this practice.

This is a simple bill. It applies only to the large leveraged buyouts.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that Members of the Congress will join me in this idea of not subsidizing this very dangerous procedure which is growing in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I include a copy of my bill, as follows:

H.R. 615

MR. VIRGIL GULKER

(Mr. UPTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor one of my constituents, Mr. Virgil Gulker of Holland, MI, for being the recipient of the "James 1:22 Award" from Christian Herald magazine. This award is given each year to the person who best exemplifies the New Testament Scripture that says "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only." As Mr. Gulker's Representative in Congress, it gives me great pleasure to publicly recognize his many contributions to his fellow man.

Mr. Gulker founded Love Inc. Church Services Network in 1977. His work started in Holland, MI, when he brought together area professionals from throughout the community to develop a uniform organization of church resources citywide. He relied on many different denominations to provide the widest possible range of services. Mr. Gulker stressed that he wouldn't ask churches to duplicate services that were already being provided; instead, the system he designed enabled churches to track the assistance each provided, as well as to determine the real needs of those who participated in their programs. From their inception, their goal was to help those who truly need immediate help, but offer self-help conditions for those who are capable of moving toward independence.

Today, Love Inc. is a connecting link to churches in 56 cities across the country that come together to help those in need. For well over a decade, Virgil Gulker's work to help move people from personal crisis to personal growth has touched the lives of countless people in Holland, and across the country.

Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today to let you know how proud I am to serve as Virgil Gulker's Congressman. He clearly is a shining example of one of the "thousand points of light" about which President Bush speaks so fondly, and I am sure that the President joins me in congratulating him for receiving this important award. Virgil Gulker and his Love Inc. organization is one point of light that has brightened the lives of many Americans and for that he deserves our endearing thanks.

CITIZENSHIP AND NATIONAL SERVICE ACT

(Mr. McCURDY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, today, I join U.S. Senator SAM NUNN in introducing the Citizenship and National Service Act, a bill which offers American young people a tremendous opportunity to serve their country in areas where the United States is experiencing tremendous need.

We in America enjoy the benefits of a free and democratic society. But democracy is not free. Democracy will prosper only with the involvement of an educated and committed citizenry. Our program is designed to provide young people with a greater opportunity for education, job training, and home ownership—opportunities which today are out of the reach of many low and moderate income families. These opportunities will be earned benefits.

In 1940, addressing his 30-year class reunion at Harvard, Walter Lippmann said;

> You took the good things for granted, you must earn them again. It is written that for every right you cherish, you have a duty that you must fulfill; for every hope you entertain, you have a task that you must perform; for every good that you wish could happen, you will have to sacrifice your comfort and ease. There is nothing for nothing any longer. With the National Service Act, our young people will be getting something for something.

Beyond national pride and the rewards of involved citizenship, veterans and graduates of the Citizens Corps created by this bill will earn education and housing benefits greater than any benefits offered today by the Federal Government.

As a member of the House Committee on Armed Services, I am deeply concerned about the prospect of a declining pool of youth available for military service. This shortage will threaten the quality of our Armed Forces and to increase the already high costs of personnel. The defense budget cannot withstand the increases in already high levels of compensation that would be necessary to attract sufficient numbers of qualified youth into military service.

In addition, there is a wide range of serious unfulfilled national, State, and community needs in health care, child care, environmental conservation, and assistance to the elderly, to name only a few. Under existing programs, these are problems which are unlikely to be solved by Government or the private sector. Voluntary civilian national service would make a substantial contribution to meeting such needs.

Since 1980, college costs have risen by 40 percent after inflation, while median family income has not kept pace. The proportion of students from blue collar and minority families enrolling in college has decreased. The emphasis of Federal aid has shifted from grants and work-study programs to Federal loans. Student indebtedness has increased by 60 percent. In addition, the default rates on student loans have skyrocketed. All of these factors copled together have created a new class of indentured students.

The Citizenship and National Service Act would serve as an incentive for young Americans to make a positive contribution of service to their Nation and communities and at the same time, it would expand their own opportunities in our society.

Involvement is the key to a well-functioning democracy and the factor that has for so long led our Nation into greatness. National service represents an appeal to the broad values of citizenship rather than to the narrow needs of self interest.

COOPERATION WITHIN THE ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has launched his administration on a high and optimistic note, his easy access to the public, everybody in the White House, his accessibility to the leadership of the Congress, the way he is expressing himself to the press, his inaugural, all of this demonstrates a new era, one in which the American people can have great confidence.

One thing that he said in the inaugural bears repetition, that we were not sent here to Washington, neither the President nor the Vice President nor the Members of Congress, we were not sent here to bicker, and we ought to be getting down to the business of cooperating, one with another.

□ 1115

I propose today that we extend the normal 100 day honeymoon that is accorded a new President to 1,000 days and during that time to declare a moratorium on bickering. The American public deserves that kind of quiet on the part of the Congress, and progress for the American society will ensue.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing about all of what I have said. I believe I am too optimistic.

SOMETHING MUST BE DONE ABOUT THE CRIME WAVE IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to tell you that I come from a State in this country where violent crime is still something that is very unusual. But I am sad to say that here in this Nation's Capital City that is not the case.

Mr. Speaker, the crime wave that has gripped this Nation's Capital is disgraceful, and something must be done and must be done soon.

Last evening, as I watched the television news, I again became furious. The news is that the night before last three people were machinegunned driving down the road in a van. Last night two separate murders. Yesterday four kids were shot in a schoolyard. This city is seized by fear, gripped by drug dealers, held hostage by murderers, and somebody needs to do something about it.

Now what is the administration of this city doing? My colleagues watched the same newscast. They are walking out of the grand juries because they are subpoenaed to testify on corruption and drugs.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time for us to say to the administration of this city, "If you can't run it, we will," and for those who talk about home rule I say, "Don't talk to me about home rule until you clean up this city."

Mr. Speaker, it is a disgrace that the Nation's Capital is not made safe for the American people.

THE FOIA AND CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, on January 11, 1989, I became aware of a recent court decision under the Freedom of Information Act. The case involved a reporter's request under the FOIA for certain Federal Bureau of Investigation documents regarding disciplinary action against an FBI agent for actions taken in the course of an undercover operation. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia denied the reporter's claim on the basis that the "public interest in assuring proper review of such agency's activities can be adequately addressed by the agency's congressional oversight committees."

As chairman of the subcommittee in the House of Representatives with oversight responsibility for the FBI, I believe that the district court fundamentally misunderstood the nature of the congressional oversight process.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve on the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives since 1965 and, since 1971, it has been my privilege to serve as chairman of that committee's subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights.

As a standing committee of the House of Representatives, the Judiciary Committee is charged with responsibility for oversight of the operation of the Federal agencies that administer and execute the laws whose subject matter is within the committee's jurisdiction. Pursuant to House Rule X, the Judiciary Committee exercises its oversight responsibilities through its subcommittees. Since 1973, the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights has had oversight responsibility for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The practice of regular congressional oversight of the FBI has been developed while I have been chairman of the subcommittee.

In carrying out its oversight, the subcommittee seeks to examine the activities of the FBI on a program by program basis. However, the subcommittee does not attempt to review every decision made by the FBI, and could not as a practical matter comprehensively review the FBI's activities. Instead, we investigate matters of concerns that are brought to our attention by members of the public and in particular by the press.

Except for a few legislatively mandated reports and an annual budget submission, the subcommittee does not receive information from the FBI on a routine basis. Instead, we request information on matters of specific interest. Often the matters on which we request information originally come to our attention through reporting in the media, and often that reporting is based on information obtained through the FOIA. Specific instances of possibly improper or questionable FBI action brought to our attention by the media or by members of the public sometimes involve matters not reflected in the FBI's presentations to us.

The subcommittee has never sought to substitute itself for an informed public or an alert press. Nor does the subcommittee see its access to executive branch information as a substitute for the rights of access established by the Freedom of Information Act. To the contrary, the subcommittee relies to a significant extent on the public and the press to bring to our attention matters that merit investigation and legislative response. The congressional oversight process thus depends on the FOIA to an important degree.

The subcommittee is not in a position to assure on its own the public interest in proper review of the FBI's activities. On the one hand, we do not have the resources to investigate all the issues that are brought to our attention. On some issues, the public has to rely on protections and processes other than congressional oversight, which are served by the FOIA. On the other hand, many of the matters that we investigate originally come to light via a citizen's FOIA request or a report in the news media.

As an example of the interaction between the FOIA and the oversight process, I might cite the CISPES case. Last year the FBI, my subcommittee and other congressional oversight committees spent considerable time reviewing the FBI's 1981-85 investigations of CISPES, a group opposed to U.S. foreign policy in Central America. The FBI's investigations raised serious first amendment concerns. My subcommittee had previously looked into the matter. However, our interest was renewed and heightened last year when a public interest group obtained, under the FOIA, a large quantity of FBI documents on the case. The release of these documents generated intense public and congressional interest, which led the Director of the FBI to conduct his own review of the matter and ultimately to institute a series of reforms in the conduct and supervision of similar cases and the handling of informants. The use of the FOIA by the private group played a critical role in renewing congressional oversight on this issue last year, which led the FBI to adopt important internal reforms.

The FBI's so-called Library Awareness Program offers another example of the relationship between the FOIA and our subcommittee's oversight activities: In the fall of 1987, the New York Times reported that the FBI was asking librarians in the New York City area to report on certain library users who might be involved in hostile intelligence activities. We thereafter requested and received from the FBI a briefing on the program. In early 1988, a reporter obtained through the FOIA a transcript of an FBI official's remarks on the program to a library commission. The transcript, which we would not have known of otherwise, raised for us additional questions about the program. It prompted us to hold two hearings on the program and to press the Director to issue guidelines limiting it, which he did in September 1988.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the FOIA and the congressional oversight process serve distinct interests. The FOIA and congressional oversight are sometimes complementary, but the principle of public accountability does not depend solely on the Congress. The public is entitled to direct access to information about its Government and the actions of the Government's agents.

TRIBUTE TO PAGES IN THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, when the House of Representatives is in regular session, the pace around here is ordinarily nothing short of hectic, a state with which my distinguished colleagues are familiar. Without the efforts of many, many people, it would be next to impossible to balance the numerous simultaneous commitments with which Members are faced throughout the day. Long hours on the job are familiar to us all, but there is one group in particular that deserves special recognition. I'm speaking of the outstanding young people who serve as pages in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, today we bid farewell to the pages we have come to know and depend on over the past number of months. I'd like to take this opportunity to commend their fine work and their dedication to their jobs and to thank them for the tireless hours and numerous tasks they've performed over the past semester.

The job is not an easy one, I assure you. Throughout the term, these high school juniors must maintain their studies, attending regular academic classes for several hours every morning before reporting to work. Somehow, they manage to excel, despite the tireless hours. As we know all to well, Congress sometimes remains in session until the late hours of the evening or the wee hours of the morning. The pages, despite their early-morning hours, stay on the job—long after most folks have gone home to bed.

Very often, the job of a page is a thankless one. There's an old saying that we don't realize just what we have until it's missing. Many of us probably don't realize just how much we depend on these young people—a fact which is a tribute to their efficiency. This is the time to recognize the outstanding job they've done. Of course, a new group will arrive to take up where this group leaves off, so it is appropriate to take this moment to say "thank you" to those who are departing.

Mr. Speaker, the young people leaving us are members of a very select group. First and foremost, they are to be commended for their selection for the page program. The competition for these few positions is fierce, and many, many qualified applicants are turned away every year. Our pages are among the top students in the Nation. They are the brightest and the best, and they are some of our most politically active youth. These young people represent the future of our Nation. In a few short years, some of them may well return to walk the halls of the Capitol, having traded their page uniforms for a Member's pin.

I certainly hope that the House pages have enjoyed their stay in Washington as much as we have enjoyed having them here. My first introduction to Capitol Hill was as a page in the House of Representatives many years ago, in the 83rd and 84th Congresses. From the excitement of the infamous shooting in the House Chamber on March 1, 1954, to the memories of House leaders of that day, including Speakers Martin and Rayburn and, yes, Speaker O'Neil who was a freshman in the 83rd, and Speaker WRIGHT who was a freshman in the 84th, to the enduring friendships I made as a young man in Washington, my experiences as a page are unforgettable. Indeed, I regard the page experience as the single best learning experience of my life. it was an absorptive experience. You learn the moves of the House, lore, procedure, character, compromise the legislative process, in ways not found in textbooks.

So, to my young friends: as you pack your bags and prepare to return home, keep in mind that you carry with you my best wishes and those of my colleagues. I am confident that each of you has the capacity to be successful on whatever road you choose to pursue. Thank you for the outstanding service you have performed as pages in the House of Representatives, and best of luck in all of your future endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, I include herewith a list of the departing pages.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT). COMMUNITY AND JOBS PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYNE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Community and Jobs Protection Act of 1989. This bill requires large corporations—presently required by section 7(a) of the Clayton Act to receive the approval of the Federal Trade Commission before entering into a merger or acquisition—to file statements with the FTC describing the probable impact of the acquisition on their constituent workers and communities. After the statement is filed, employees or local governments that are likely to be affected by the acquisition may request an FTC investigation into the community impact statement. If, after holding hearings, the FTC determines that the acquisition will have a substantial adverse effect on employment, the corporations will be denied the tax deduction for the interest paid on debt incurred to finance the acquisition.

As we all know, activity in mergers and acquisitions involving American corporations is reaching startling new heights. A number of economists have identified the present activity in mergers and acquisitions as the fourth merger wave in U.S. economic history. The difference between the activity of the 1980's and that of previous merger waves is the heavy reliance on corporate debt and the replacement of equity with that debt.

Corporate debt in the United States has doubled over the past 6 years. The interest payments on that debt account for over 20 percent of the cash-flow of American corporations. Short-term corporate debt—debt that is particularly vulnerable to volatile interest rates—accounts for over half of the corporate debt in this country.

The most recent "megadeal"—a leveraged buyout of RJR Nabisco announced in October and agreed upon in December of last year—serves as an excellent example of the reasons for the concern many of us in Congress have about the effect of the current merger wave on the future of the American economy. The successful bid for RJR Nabisco was finally set at $25.6 billion—the highest price ever paid for a corporation and one that is almost twice as high as the previous record bid. It is my understanding that this deal will be financed by a combination of bank loans, junk bonds, and convertible bonds. When added to RJR Nabisco's debt existing before the takeover, the entire debt for RJR Nabisco will exceed $24 billion. If the interest rate on this debt is equal to 12 percent per year, RJR Nabisco's interest payments will be more than $2.5 billion in the first year. This is approximately twice the net earnings of RJR Nabisco in 1987.

In order to service that debt, the managers of RJR Nabisco have three options: They can generate higher earnings through an increase in sales; they can cut costs significantly to increase profits; or they can sell off some of the assets of the corporation.

Of the three options, increasing sales is the most attractive. Increased sales would stimulate the economy as a whole, would justify the change in ownership and would keep the corporation's labor and capital productive and producing. Unfortunately, it is unlikely that RJR Nabisco's sales will increase sufficiently to allow the corporation to service its debt without resorting to other options. RJR management predicted that profits would more than triple by 1998. The management of RJR Nabisco project that sales in both the tobacco and food divisions will double over the next 10 years. If the growth in sales does not occur as the new owners anticipate, they will be unable to meet their debt-service obligations by relying solely on increased cash-flow.

That leaves the managers of RJR Nabisco with the options of selling assets or cutting costs. They have discussed the sale of assets as one option for retiring that enormous debt. If the new owners of RJR Nabisco can find purchasers for the assets they want to sell and if they succeed in getting the price for those assets on which they bet when compiling their bid for RJR Nabisco, the debt will be retired quickly and the corporation's debt service obligations will accordingly shrink.

However, in evaluating the probabilities that this plan will succeed, we need to review a little history. RJR Nabisco is itself the product of a recent merger. In May 1985, Nabisco merged with R.J. Reynolds. Management discussions at that time claimed that the emerging corporation would be able to produce more efficiently by taking advantage of economies of scale and joint management and administration. No, it appears that there are diseconomies of scale of sufficient size to justify breaking up, through asset sales, a conglomerate that is just over 4 years old.

Let me point out that the team that is responsible for purchasing RJR Nabisco also bought out Beatrice Foods in 1986, using leveraged funds to finance the acquisition. According to recent articles in the Wall Street Journal and Business Week, this team has been far less successful in finding purchasers for the assets of Beatrice Foods than they had anticipated. While it will not be necessary to default on the Beatrice debt, the team will just about break even. The sale of Beatrice Foods came in at $5.6 billion, less than one-fourth the size of the RJR Nabisco deal. As the name implies, the major product of Beatrice Foods is in food production. Apparently, the food industry is not as eager to buy new assets as had been hoped.

The Nabisco division of RJR Nabisco is also in the food industry and many of the assets that are likely to go on the auction block are food production units—such as the Nabisco line of cookies and crackers, the Del Monte line of canned fruits and vegetables, Nabisco's breakfast cereal products, and the Planters Peanuts division. If those asset sales do not generate the income expected, the team will have to turn elsewhere to find the funds to service the debt of over $24 billion.

As I stated earlier, that "somewhere else" is likely to be in cost cutting and the most vulnerable target for cost cutting these days is in the area of labor. RJR Nabisco has experience with merger-induced layoffs and plant closings. Shortly after R.J. Reynolds Tobacco merged with Nabisco, Inc., in 1985, the new management team closed down the Reynolds headquarters in Winston-Salem, NC, and laid off over 600 workers. RJR Nabisco's decision to cut costs ended a corporate-community relationship that had lasted for well over 100 years. Now, 2 years later, the citizens of Winston-Salem fear further disruption in their community as the newest owners seek to cut costs. While the employees of the Reynolds division will benefit from the high prices they will receive for their Reynolds stock, many of them are convinced that their jobs will once again be cut in an effort to finance the most recent change of ownership of their company.

John Brooks, writing in 1987 about the fourth merger wave, said,

When a corporate takeover results in the liquidation of a company or some of its parts, real jobs are lost, real communities disrupted or destroyed, and real production lost; when a company exists, as so many do, under the constant threat of a takeover, morale may be destroyed, the corporate policy disrupted, and employees at all levels made to live in a state of fear or hysteria.

My own hometown—Pittsburgh, PA—is well aware of the truth of Mr. Brooks's analysis. In 1984, the Gulf Corp. was the subject of a hostile takeover attempt engineered by T. Boone Pickens of Mesa Petroleum. The negotiations and counterbids lasted months, during which time Gulf employees in Pittsburgh and across the Nation were unsure of their future with a company under siege. As we all know, Gulf was ultimately purchased by Chevron, becoming the largest acquisition in American history until last month's buyout of RJR Nabisco. Chevron bought Gulf and paid handsomely for it. In order to cut costs, the Pittsburgh headquarters of the Gulf Corp. was closed and 1,100 Pittsburghers were left unemployed.

I wish I could tell you that the stories of Gulf and Reynolds, the stories of Pittsburgh and Winston-Salem, are unusual, but they are not. Consider these:

Chrysler Corp. purchased AMC in 1984. In 1985, Chrysler management concluded that, because of the AMC acquisition, the corporation now had excess plant capacity. Chrysler is shutting down the plant located in Kenosha, WI, laying off over 5,000 employees in a town of 20,000.

Thatcher Glass Corp. was taken private in 1981. It filed for bankruptcy in 1984, and subsequently dismissed more than 4,000 employees.

In 1982, Allied Corp. purchased Bendix, stripped it of $850 million in assets, closed its corporate headquarters and shut down several divisions, eliminating hundreds of jobs in the process.

Goodyear Tire & Rubber added $2.6 billion to its debt in order to buy back shares held by the public and stock acquired by James Goldsmith in a takeover attempt. It subsequently cut back its operations and reduced its work force by 1,000 people.

A few hours' research in the business section of a library will produce dozens more examples like these. They all lead inevitably to the conclusion that mergers and acquisitions, at best, create uncertainty and fear for affected workers and communities. At worst, they can destroy a thriving town.

I am not opposed to all mergers and acquisitions. Some of them are undertaken with a view toward long-term increases in productivity, rather than short-term market profits. Some create stronger, more competitive corporations. When corporate mergers increase productivity and enhance the efficient use of resources, they should be encouraged.

But those mergers and acquisitions that are motivated by greed and the desire to exploit the market system for easy profits, those that adversely affect communities for the sake of quick gains, are unnecessary, undesirable, and dangerous. Such acquisitions are not in the public interest and should not be encouraged by the regulatory and fiscal policies of the Federal Government.

Accordingly, I am introducing today the Community and Jobs Protection Act of 1989. This bill will not prohibit acquisitions that are found to be economically useful and beneficial to the economy. Such acquisitions will undoubtedly be found to be in the public interest and will be allowed to proceed without hindrance.

However, in those cases in which an acquisition places an undue burden on society, the affected workers and communities will be given an opportunity to request a hearing to assess the impact of the proposed acquisition. If the proposed acquisition is found to have a substantial adverse effect on employment, the participating corporations will not be allowed to take advantage of the corporate interest deduction for debt acquired to finance the acquisition.

When an acquisition is found to be beneficial to the public good, it should be allowed to go forward. But, when a merger or acquisition is proposed which does not benefit society, it should not be subsidized through Federal tax expenditures on interest deductions.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the Community and Jobs Protection Act.

I would like to include at this time a copy of the bill:

H.R. 679

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the Community and Jobs Protection Act of 1989.

SEC. 2. If two or more corporations propose to merge, if with respect to such merger such corporations are required to file a notification under section 7A of the Clayton Act and if the merger may be reasonably expected to reduce the number of employees employed in an establishment of such a corporation in the county, city, or other jurisdiction in which the establishment is located by more than one hundred employees, each corporation to be involved in the proposed merger shall file, in accordance with section 3, a community impact statement. A community impact statement shall include—

(1) the nature of the business of the establishment of the corporation at which the reduction of employees will take place,

(2) the reasons for such reduction,

(3) any alternative to such reduction,

(4) a plan to minimize the effects of such reduction on the remaining employees in such establishment and on any unit of general local government having jurisdiction over the area in which such reduction will take place,

(5) the economic circumstances of such corporation including the level of profitability of the operation at the establishment of such corporation at which the reduction in employment will take place and any plan for future investments, employment, and production at such establishment, and

(6) the number of employees who will lose their employment as a result of the merger.

SEC. 3. The community impact statement required by section 2 shall be submitted to the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, to the employees and representatives of each labor organization representing such employees at each corporation involved in the merger, and to each unit of general local government having jurisdiction over an area in which establishment of each such corporation is located. The statement shall be filed on the same date a notification respecting the merger is filed under section 7A of the Clayton Act.

SEC. 4. If, within fourteen days of the submittal of a community impact statement under section 3, the Federal Trade Commission receives a request by a unit of local government which has received the community impact statement or by at least 10 per centum of the employees of a corporation which filed such statement, the Commission shall conduct an investigation into, and hold public hearings on, the community impact statement. Such an investigation shall include—

(1) the economic reasons for the proposed reduction in employment described in the statement,

(2) the estimated extent of the economic losses to the employees employed in the establishment in which such reduction will occur, including the number of employees who will lose their employment as a result of the merger,

(3) the estimated extent of any economic loss, including a decline in the tax base, of any unit of general local government having jurisdiction over such establishment and any economic loss to any person in the geographic area in which such establishment is located, and

(4) the recommendations of any such unit of local government, any labor union representing employees in each corporation to be involved in the proposed merger, or any other person respecting the proposed merger.

SEC. 5. After an investigation is concluded under section 4, the Federal Trade Commission shall prepare and publish a report containing the findings of the investigation and recommendations as to whether or not legal action should be taken to halt such merger.

SEC. 6. (a) Section 279 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to interest on indebtedness incurred by a corporation to acquire stock or assets of another corporation) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(k) SPECIAL RULE FOR OBLIGATIONS ISSUED FOR CORPORATE MERGERS ADVERSELY AFFECTING EMPLOYMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If the Federal Trade Commission makes a finding described in paragraph (2) with respect to a corporate merger—

"(A) any obligation issued in connection with such merger shall be treated for purposes of this section as corporate acquisition indebtedness, and

"(B) the excess referred to in subsection (a) with respect to such indebtedness shall be treated as zero.

"(2) FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION FINDING.—The finding referred to in paragraph (1) is a finding by the Federal Trade Commission, made after an investigation held under section 4 of the Community and Jobs Protection Act of 1989, that a proposed corporate merger will have a substantial adverse effect on employment in a county, city, or other jurisdiction.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to obligations issued after the date of the enactment of this Act.

FURTHER UPDATE ON COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

As the gentleman comes down, congratulations on the go-ahead sign the gentleman gave to the country in his new chairmanship.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair very much. That is extremely generous. The Chair had expressed its good wishes, and I for one am particularly very grateful to the Chair, in view of the fact the gentleman from Florida is one of our very senior, very experienced and most able leaders of this House, particularly in the area of defense.

I have honored the gentleman from Florida, let me say.

Mr. Speaker, I have said as of last week that it was my intention to continue to report to my colleagues, and particularly since the assumption of the chairmanship of this very historic and fundamental Committee on Banking.

I said last week, I think there is a very appropriate quote from the great Bard of Avon, Shakespeare, and I am going to refer to it, because at this moment not only would I have to report, but what is happening is the organizational processes that since the Legislative Reform Act of 1974 compels us to follow a well-defined course insofar as the majority of the controlling party Members or the leaders of the majority section of the House are concerned.

I think it is most appropriate, and I remind myself of it, since I have been a very faithful and very patient member of the Banking Committee for the almost 28 years that I have been honored to serve in the U.S. House or Representatives.

Now that I am chairman, as I said last week, it is not my intention to assume any different role or different personality from that which I believe has reflected my sentiments, my votes, and my actions, as a Representative of the 20th District of Texas.

Anyway, I am quoting now:

'Tis a common proof that lowliness is young ambition's ladder whereto the climber upward turns his face; but when he attains the utmost round, he then unto the latter turns his back, looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees by which he did ascend.

It certainly never has been my experience ever to have turned my back on my origins and the experiences that in a series of elections, from the lowest to the highest rungs of the Representative, legislative-representative bodies, I have been greatly privileged to serve, 3 years, as I said before, on the city council of my native city of San Antonio, 5 years in that great body known as the Texas State Senate, and then going on 28 years in the U.S. House of Representatives, is something that compels me to redouble my efforts, no matter how onerous, to continue what I have done all along and that is have a sustained activity by way of reporting.

□ 1130

As a matter of fact, I would like to advise my colleagues that even while serving on the city council, I took advantage of the then single Spanish-language radio station that offered me, and it was the only one that offered me, an opportunity to report once a week on my activities on the city council. The same opportunity was given the other eight members, but maybe one of the reasons was I was the only one that could fluently express myself in Spanish.

As I reached then the State Senate, I was able, after some effort, to get the consent of one of the television stations in English to allow me to report on a weekly basis during the time the State senate was in session. However, the only Spanish-language TV station in the United States, which was founded in my native city of San Antonio, from the very beginning offered me that opportunity even before my actual election to the State senate, and then following my election to the Congress, all of the three basic, fundamental television stations in English offered me that opportunity, for which I have been extremely thankful.

In the course of the years, one of the stations, the CBS outlet, removed my reporting off, so I am very grateful for the other two on which I still report once a week taping from here, and particularly during the time that the Congress is in session, and that is the two English-language television reports, and the one Spanish-language television report. In the meanwhile, though, there have been several cable TV stations and a couple in Spanish, but they do not offer this opportunity or I would be glad to provide the same report. On the other hand, of the English-language radio stations, not a one is continuing my program. However, all but one, and that means four, of the Spanish-language radio stations continue through thick and thin to offer that opportunity.

Believe it or not, even though the Spanish language as a viable vehicle has really been lost, I want to sort of alleviate the fears of those who think it is necessary to have an English official only type of legislation, because in our daily life in the United States that is the official language. In a way, it is tragic, because I think the multiple cultural heritage of our Nation should not be lost, and that means the language heritage.

In San Antonio, for an example, for 44 years it was the site of the only Spanish-language daily newspaper published in the United States, and it finally had to close its doors in 1953. The reason was very simple. Its basic readership had either grown up or were born in the United States, were grown up and no longer were desirous of reading in Spanish.

In 1934, and this is a very historical note that I do not think has been noted by historians, that history has yet to be written, but because of the raging depression in the United States and the amnesty proclamation of the President of Mexico at that time, Lazaro Cardenas, in my county alone, 22,000 people went back to Mexico. Of that number, I guess 100 percent of them were the ones who subscribed to the paper. I think it would be interesting to note that in 1928, 1929, 1930, and 1932, La Prensa of San Antonio, the only Spanish-language daily published in the United States, had a greater circulation than either one of the English-language dailies in San Antonio, but that was another world.

Today there is not even a monthly publication in Spanish in San Antonio, so it shows us that even though because of the proximity to Mexico and other countries, the language may be spoken to a certain extent, it can be understood verbally, but as far as reading and writing, I am afraid that heritage has gone by the way.

However, given the freedom in our country, there is no law to prevent anybody, any American, from preserving and cultivating his own individual heritage and language heritage as well as he feels it is wise to do so.

I say all of this because the world has changed, and I have been blessed with good memory and recollection, and I know that we are living in a drastically different, radically different world, very difficult to evolve that period other than as I am trying crudely to do so. The reason I allude to that is that at each step of the way, it has never been my purpose to forget the source of my recognition and election to a public elective office and, therefore, I believe in strict accountability.

In the 35½ years that I have been honored to serve in a public elective office, never has any attack ever been made on my personal integrity; neither can I tell you that I am any richer or any poorer personally than I was when I entered this arena of political effort. The reason was that I have been blessed with everything, a very limpid, clear reason and purpose, for once I discovered that legislative advocacy, which is what I call it, was really my whole interest and devotion, and I call it legislative advocacy, because I believe sooner or later, as our country matures in experience, we will realize that these are special categories of endeavor that more experienced, more mature nations with greater governmental experience have long ago realized.

For instance, in England it never has been a problem just to call anybody a professional politician. As a matter of fact, Winston Churchill considered that a high badge of honor, but the reason is that through the distilled experience, the English realized that there are those in our human endeavor who, by avocation, interest, and personal attributes, are headed to this thing we call public endeavor, so that Winston Churchill, as an early young man, was in the political field and matured and grew in experience, and that niche was recognized and continues to be recognized in the British or English society, much to its credit.

In our country we believe that our badge of honor is the amount of money we have in the bank or our pocketbook. If one is successful in business, our theory is they are going to be successful in everything else, including government, and, of course, the distilled experience of these older and more mature societies is that that is not necessarily true.

Finding myself rewarded by the constituents, I have then tried to evolve some accountability. Since being elected to the chairmanship of this historic committee known as the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, I feel that I have a like or similar responsibility to my colleagues in general, and that means that I consider this no longer a provincial responsibility even though I will continue to report to my constituents, because there are many other multiple duties that I must perform in the defense of the interests of the district. However, now these duties transcend the purely parochial and local, and I wish to render reports on its activities of my stewardship as chairman of this committee.

Some may say that they do not know why I want to be so audacious and presumptuous as to do this; nobody has before. But then I am not casting any reflections on anybody. I am just being true to my own self above all, and I thought that these words and lines from Shakespeare where most apt and appropriate.

And these are what I remind the new, fresh, young Members while we are in the throes of organizing subcommittees and organizing the structure of the committee and all as is called for by the rules adopted in the Reform Act of 1974.

It so happens that I believe there is also an additional dimension to the responsibility of reporting, and that is at this conjunction in our history the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs is facing some of the most serious issues that it has faced in five decades, 50 years, and it is that that I wish to report on. Plus, I would like at least in my last 5 minutes to devote time to an issue in a way associated with this general issue of banking, but which goes back to something I have been speaking out on with respect to our very, very endangered relationships with the countries with whom we must share our destiny in the new world, and particularly to those south of the border.

In the first place, I believe that every one of my colleagues, as with most that I have met have expressed since the day we met on January 3, your great concern about the so-called FSLIC or the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Fund or Corporation, which is the insurance fund for the savings and loan industry. The fact is that no explanation can be had in an encapsulated form to be fully understood, where at this juncture it seems that suddenly out of nowhere these are front page issues, and particularly since the flurry and the frenzy and the blizzard of announcements during the latter part of the month of December past, and the indignation that was expressed to me by a goodly number of colleagues on January 3 when we first met about how come, what are we going to do, what is the committee going to do. We are never going to stand by here and allow a taxpayer's bailout under these conditions, and what are the facts behind these stories?

As embarrassing as it was, I had to admit that we as members of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs did not know any more than anybody else, because all we had been receiving from the Federal Home Loan Bank Board were their press releases. So that as soon as we could, which was on January 4, even before the committee was organized, I thought it wise, proper, and responsible to open hearings on one of the issues that had never been discussed as far as I know on the House side, and which had everything to do with events that if they should find themselves in confluence or conjunction could very well shatter the stability of our financial institutional reference in our country.

So we had on January 4 and 5 hearings on the Third World or the lesser developed countries debt situation. Since then I have met with Ambassadors, Finance Ministers, and have confirmed the apprehension that I knew we should have been expressing for some time on our side of this thing. We were very honored. We made history because on the second day we had the Finance Minister of Costa Rica accompanied by the Ambassador from Costa Rica, that country being one of the most stable and the most democratic, in fact I would say that its history of democracy equals ours, and even under greater stress. And even though it is a tiny country, is has a very glorious history. Its neighbors, on the contrary, have been sunk with great degrees of poverty and ignorance, uneducated citizens, whereas Costa Rica sits forth like a jewel in a settting as a hallmark of democracy. They have had free public education for 100 years. They have had completely democratically held and open elections. They have had periods in which that was threatened, but they resolved it. It is the only nation that does not have a standing army and has never seen fit to do so. The only time they have come near to it is when I expressed my indignation when we compelled, and tried to compel, and tried to force down their throats the presence of our defense contingent, Green Berets, and the like. Fortunately, I think wisdom finally prevailed.

But in any event, the Finance Minister presented very valuable testimony. Any of my colleagues interested, I will be delighted to let them join us and consult with us, and give them copies of the testimony.

In conjunction with that hearing, we had representatives from the private banking sector who gave valuable testimony and expressed their consensus that they were quite aware of the seriousness of the problem, and that they would work to the best of their ability within the private banking system, accommodations and arrangements, to safeguard against any kind of a calamitous development.

We had testimony from Moody's Investors and others who kept the books and keep the books on investing quality and the like. We had the regulators, the comptroller of the currency, and we had the chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Each gave extremely valuable testimony to our committee.

Also, on the question as to what extent does the Third World debt and the existence of the situation as it impacts the social conditions in those countries, endangering stability and, therefore, the incursion of antagonistic forces that may be antagonistic to the American national interest, impact or threaten to impact on the stability and solidness of our banking system. That is our approach, and that is the fundamental approach we must take.

So if any our colleagues desire to have copies of the testimony by the regulators and other witnesses, please let me know. All Members have to do is pick up the phone and call me at my office.

The other thing was, given the nature of the concern as expressed not only by the Members but their constituents, I think in joinder with the very distinguished and very wonderful colleague, the ranking memer on the minority side, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CHALMERS WYLIE, we drafted a letter of invitation to the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to appear before us on Tuesday, January 10. He did appear. We had an all-day session. We had a tremendously good turnout on the part of the membership of the committee, including brand new Members just recently assigned to the committee, and that is actually three in number.

I will say by way of parenthesis that when I first came to the Congress the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs was almost half the size of what it is today. So, therefore, we are talking about an entirely different situation from a structural or logistic standpoint.

I might also say the other troubling thing, and I say this for the edification of my colleagues, particularly those who serve on the committee, I was not aware of until I assumed the chairmanship that as of October 1 we were losing $300,000 of the budget assigned to this committee. That is calamitous. I was not aware of it because it was done by way of rescission, and because the former chairman, it was something I was not aware of, had returned to the House committee of appropriate jurisdiction, the Committee on House Administration, that amount of money. I also discovered that six of the personnel slots, staff slots had not been filled.

So that now we find ourselves with a real dilemma. We find ourselves, in comparison to another committee with half of the budget allocated to our committee as distinguished from this other committee. And one other that has considerably more budgetary allocation even though it is by common agreement that this committee now faces the biggest issues it has confronted in 50 years.

So we are kind of coming into the arena with one hand tied behind our backs. But I might say to my colleagues that has been the story of my life. At every juncture it seems that we had to face, in addition to the issues, some very, very troubling obstacles. But with goodwill and with the ever constant faith in the ultimate sense of justice of the majority I am sure we will find a satisfactory resolution.

I say that by way of parenthesis so that my colleagues will understand the size and dimensions of the problems as we are in the throes of organizing the committees and subcommittees.

Final organizational decisions should be over next week, Wednesday, February 1.

But on top of that, time and events will not wait. I had predicted a year ago, and then almost in a shrill voice last May and June, in fact I took this House floor and repeatedly warned against the obvious developing crisis that we would be confronting. My apprehensions were deep because they were based on the statistics that we were able to get. Even though those figures were fragmentary, they were ominous as sufficient to indicate that unless something were done relatively quickly we would have, ultimately, a very, very critical situation.

What I feared the most, which is what I fear today, was the loss of the viability of what we have proudly called our insurance fund system.

We live in such an interrelated world, not only domestically but internationally, that we now also must face additional complications because of forces external to our shores over which we no longer have any control.

So while all of these things now are reaching ahead, the failure to act was, in my opinion, a fatal mistake. But last year was an election year and their was fear on those having to defend their positions back home, with being attacked as being spenders or advocating costly bailouts or whatever you want to call it, losing sight of the fact as we continue to do, that it is not a question of bailing out any particular financial entity, it is a question of saving the viability of our insurance fund system because our constituents are well aware that when they deposit their moneys in an insured depository institution, whether it is a S&L, whether it is a bank, whether it is a credit union, that they have our Government's assurance that they are insured. If the precarious situation confronting the fund is allowed to deteriorate and a loss of confidence results, we will be then confronting a different dimension which will make it extremely difficult to work wisely.

Always my creed has been to work in anticipation, anticipatory action. This is the reason I was so exercised last May and June, particularly in June when the Home Loan Bank Board announced what they called in Texas the Southwest plan. To compound my problems I tried to get action; I went to the then committee chairman. I suggested a course of action, but it was impossible during that period of an election year.

I then did the next best thing one individual could do, I called in our oversight arm known as the General Accounting Office. I asked the General Accounting Office to just evaluate, because nobody knew for sure and they still do not know for sure, what the size of the hole was, not nationally but just in my home State of Texas where the problem seemed to be most virulent.

GAO said, as they always do "yes, we will follow your request." I laid out the parameters of the request but they told me they would probably not have any results until the end of the year, that is at the end of December last.

Last month I was advised it probably would not have been ready until the end of this month. And now that is just in Texas. The reason, the difficulty, as I said in May and in June after the Southwest plan was announced, that the actions taken in line of what was available to the managers of the Board—which incidentally, again by way of parentheses, a reform of which I had been advocating since 1966 when we had the first credit crunch. It was obvious then that institutions in the special category, put together by the Congress for a special purpose in the 1930's, would be the most vulnerable if you had instability or continuing instability in the markets and interest rates.

That experience in June 1966 should have been obvious but we were all happily going along believing that it would be endless, that America, as it enjoyed after the war, would forever and ever be able to continue with two cars in the garage, all the creature comforts we could conceivably imagine, that we could continue at a pace of production in basic industries, steel and the like, automobiles, as if the world was the same, as if it had been set in concrete as of 1959, 1960.

But it was obvious to anyone who was following—and this is the reason I opted to stay on the Committee on Banking—I have had in the past opportunity to go on the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Appropriations, all of which are the centers of attraction to any one of us because they are supposed to be the power, the power bodies. But I opted to stay because in the State senate of Texas I was chairman of the committee on banking; on the city council of San Antonio I made finances, and the interpretation and deciphering of the city's budget—which incidentally the city budget can be just as complicated as a Federal budget—my primary purpose.

So it soon developed that as a lonely member of the city council I was the only one who could analyze that budget and even take on the finance director of the city.

As a result, for example, the only 3 years in the history of the city council of San Antonio that the firemen and policemen received each year for 3 consecutive years an across-the-board wage increase were those 3 years I was on the city council.

When I proposed the first one, the city manager said "We don't have any money," very much like we are told today. And again the question was priorities. If we set a perverse priority system, no matter how much we think we are saving, it is false economy. So that on a municipal level the primary municipal functions are fire, police, and health.

The policemen were receiving a salary of $160 a month, as well as firemen, and the policemen were not even given allowance for uniforms but had to pay it out of their pocket.

I had served as chief juvenile probation officer and intimately became acquainted with the law enforcement proponent, fully advised as to their sufferings and their dangers, and on some occasions, accompanied them when they faced serious bodily harm or death. So I was able to look at the city manager and the finance director and say, "Yes, you do have the money if it is the will of this council to so decide, and here is where you will find the money." With that having been answered, the council passed across the board and the second year I said we still had to keep on going because all the time when there is a downward turn in the economy, those serving in a public capacity, teachers, firemen, and the like, are the first to suffer the cut. When there is an upturn, they are the last to get caught up with. This is obvious. It is like the public school system, it will always be under attack from here or their or somewhere because it is like a lonely tree out there under a lightning storm, it will be hit. It is a good, good object for those who have whatever pet peeves they have to take them out on, and it is a sorry story of our public servants in our great democracy that they are the last to be caught up and they are the first to go down, so that in any event, I just give that as an illustration of what being prepared to understand the intricacies of finances.

I was told that I could get on the Armed Services Committee, I wouldn't be able to serve my district. I had, thank goodness, 5 years' experience in the State senate, and I knew that was not so, and in our great, wonderful system it was not what committee you were assigned to or what it was labeled, as so many of my young colleagues in the Banking Committee seem to think, it is what we do. It is where our interest is. It is what we want to do. We all have no more power than voice and vote, but how we exercise it, my colleagues, is the thing, and I was able to come here in my first year, even before I was sworn in we had a calamitous announcement that a defense activity was about to be lost. Well, we did not lose it. I called on the resources available and we won it, my first year. I was advised that the biggest employer, Kelly Air Force Base, was about to have another cutback which it suffered in 1959. It had no jet engine capability. The overreciprocating piston engine was being phased out. We went to work. What happened? I did not have to belong to the Armed Services Committee. We were able to prove that Kelly Air Force had some advantages such as the largest hangar in the world, and we were able to get the first C-5-A management assignment, and from there, other jet engine and cargo engine facilities. Whereas the time I was sworn in to this Congress, employment was even less than 9,000 at Kelly. Today it is 18,000.

Now I am not trying to say that I singlehandedly, because my experience had been that if we do not interfere politically the managers in defense or any other administration will do a fine job, but what I was interested in doing was making sure that no external forces, political or otherwise, would militate against the proper interests of that activity, in the then manorial, now known as logistics, would be detrimental to the component known as Kelly Air Force Field facility.

The same in other areas, I came to the Congress and it was obvious to me that we had to do something and had basic legislation because neither the city nor the State governments were doing anything about their firemen and policemen type of basic pension, or any kind of a policy that would provide anything in the way of insurance in the case of death while on duty of either a policeman or a fireman, so I introduced the first bill to that effect in 1964, and in a new Congress in 1965, reintroduced it. I could not even get a hearing because they said it was calamitous to think they would have jurisdiction to go in and do this for States and the cities. The cities would not do it. Then came the riots; 1966-67, and then I had a call from the then-chairman of the subcommittee, later chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and he said, "Henry, we had an experience wherein the firemen went out to try to put down a fire in the riot, they were fired upon, sniped upon, and I remember you had a bill, the bill came out of the subcommittee that year, got out of the committee that year, but never got on the House floor." To make a long story short, it took 11 years before it finally got out of the House, out of the Senate, over to the President, and then when the President signed it, there were no appropriated funds.

Finally, the next Congress, the 11th year, the Congress appropriated funds. Ironically, the first payout was a policeman in my hometown of the city of San Antonio who was killed by a 15-year-old teenager, and he had left a wife and four kids. When I was in San Antonio, juvenile officer, and I was together with a patrolman by the name of Ellis, and he got shot full in the face with a shotgun, I had to go later on and attend the funeral, because I was with him and his companion when he was shot, and we had to pass the hat around so that we could raise some funds for the wife and a couple of kids. There was nothing, nothing else. The pension fund, as such, as absolutely nothing and that was on retirement.

The State did it, I was the author of the still-basic State fire and policy pension fund laws in the State of Texas, so that part of that was that they were investing these funds and playing the stock market. Very dangerous. So in our restructing of that law, we had to understand the fine points of financing and the difference between that and gambling and investment, and it is to my horror, we are faced now with the calamitous results of this money mania that has swept over our Nation.

I have said, and I will repeat now, even though it sounds shocking to some, that we should not be at all surprised as to the predicament we are confronted with. As a matter of fact, I am troubled more because there is no awareness of the real, real threat to the whole standard of living of America, to the continuation of a future destiny of world leadership for our country, and that is the threat which is real and present and which I foresaw from the very beginning in 1979 and took this floor and referred to, and so certainly now that I have assumed the chairmanship, it is my full intention that this will be right on the front burner. Why? Because the Congress is charged, not the administration, not the President, with the coinage and the value of our money. But that control and power has been lost, and I have said repeatedly, and for which I have been ridiculed and ignored, which is fine, but now the only thing I can do as a chairman, and I have said the only real power of a chairman in my book is to set the agenca, to mark the course, to blaze a trail, and then the membership in its wisdom and majority, because I am sworn to the democratic principle.

Every time I have had the power to hold the gavel, I have appealed to my record of action, not when I was seeking it but when I was actually exercising that power, to show that that is indeed what I believe in, what I subscribe to and act in accordance with.

So in this case why should we not have been worried in 1979? It was at the Bonn economic summit meeting. Jimmy Carter was President; it was not Reagan. Later on, when I was critical of Reagan, everybody said I was partisan. But I was equally critical then. Why? Because it was at that economic summit meeting that the communique's last sentence was: "We agree in principle with the EMS, the European Monetary System, and the ECU, the European Currency Unit."

I am not trying to breed hostility. I am just saying that while we have had a mindset, it is one that is far removed from the existence of the real world as it has been developing. It is a mindset that has our conception of Europe as a 1948, or at the latest, a 1959 Europe, and that Europe is gone forever.

We are not even prepared to face now the desires of a great people, the German people, in their unquenchable desire to reunify. Oh, sure everybody says that will never be. But look at what was said after the Treaty of Versailles, when it would have been obvious to anybody who had any kind of perspicacity or sentiments of knowledge of both basic human pride and basic human desires that the subjugation of a people in such a obviously outrageous manner could not last. And it did not last. But with it came the collapse of a world arrangement, and with it came the consequent collapses in our country that were the direct causes, as well as some of the underlying causes, of what we called then the Depression of the 1930's.

We have had, as I have reported here ad infinitum, the same forces back in place, in a different scene, with different personalities, in the sense that the countries that existed before World War II have undergone changes. Some of them are not even in existence now. Some of the countries that existed at the time of World War I disappeared after World War I. But the essential elements were the same. The United States was the only creditor Nation in the First World War, and we were the only creditor Nation in the Second World War. Now the United States is the biggest debtor Nation, as of 4 years, in the whole world.

What has been keeping this so-called prosperity going? Borrowed money, the infusion of foreign funds. Investors do not come in pro bono. They are not coming in here because they want to sustain what they call America's debt spree. They came in because they invest that money in assets that we have in our country, in Government bonds, bills, and the like. They are the ones that have been suffering the debt we have piled up.

Now, in the meanwhile, as to the fluctuation in the value of the dollar, we no longer have control of these external forces that impact on that situation. So let us assume, as I foresaw in August 1979, that the system was fleshed out as it is already. The ECU unit, the Europeans Currency Unit, is worth $1.25, maybe a little bit more by now. It is in place. If a student at the University of Bologna in Italy, which now wants to call itself the University of Europe, wants, he can get a grant of 5,000 ECU's and go and study in Paris or in Brussels or in Germany. And it is likewise with the other citizens. By 1992 it is expected that what the Treaty of Rome had visualized, on top of the emergence of the integrated financial system, would be an economic system will be in place. Notwithstanding to the contrary a refusal on the part of Great Britain to join, it will be in place. Frankly, it can be looked upon, if we keep dozing and sleeping, as a danger, or it can be looked upon as a great opportunity.

But while Europe is integrating, we are disintegrating domestically. This is what I have been yelling about. So now we have the specific symptomatic crisis in the S&L's. On February 6, 1986, the GAO told us that the size of the whole that would be required to replenish the insurance fund known as FSLIC was $23.5 billion. Just yesterday the chairman of the FDIC said it would be more like somewhere between $80 billion and over $100 billion. But it keeps shifting, and as I warned last May, as long as it is unattended and the schemes put together by the Home Loan Bank Board continue that noxious course of compounding on a geometric, progressive basis, the size of that whole grows. I estimated in June, and said so publicly on and off the House floor, that that amount would be no less than $1 billion per month.

Now, what has that got to do with this other subject matter of ECU and EMS? Everything. That is because they have created an exchange unit of great stability. If we indulge ourselves with the idea, with relations to gold, for instance, that the currencies have been demonitized, I want to remind my colleagues that I said we repealed the 1932 act that as far as I knew, we were the only ones holding to that thesis. Certainly the French never had. They were holding on to whatever they could in gold reserves.

Then to my astonishment, the Secretary of the Treasury, Bill Simon, announced that not only was he going to prove that gold was no longer a factor, he would have sales of our gold stock on a bid basis. When I pointed out that that gold would end up in the central vaults of France and other countries, he said, "No, we are not going to permit any bidders for that." I said, "My God, how naive can we be? What is wrong with getting an independent bidder and then he actually ending up selling what he rightfully now has, what we have made possible for him to possess, to that central bank?"

So with the gold reserves that the group of 10 or even the group of 6 have, and which they still consider as an integral part of the reserve behind it, they have developed a very, very stable exchange unit. The dangerous thing was that the Japanese moved in to the use of that in what I thought was a substantial way just about 7 or 8 months ago. So if the dollar—and God forbid, but us be realistic because it can happen—should lose further, and it is already out as the currency unit, they may lose confidence even further. Suppose that the instability, the loss of confidence of these foreign investors in the value of their dollars held as investments, takes hold, then what is the meaning of that to us? I will tell you what it is, I say to my colleagues. It means that we now, strapped as we are with the public debt and the massive individual debt, will have to pay our debts not in our currencies but in their currencies. And I cannot begin to tell my colleagues what that implies.

Yes, there are a lot of nice soft-sounding words, there is soft soap we hear from some of the spokesmen over there in Europe who say, "No, we are not troubled at all about the dollar's instability." That is fine. But the guy who has that investment is not telling us that. I am telling you that, because I read foreign journals, and I have communications from individuals who are sitting on the boards of some of these big financial institutions on foreign shores, and I want to assure my colleagues that at no time should we expect anyone to look after our national interests first and foremost other than ourselves.

What I am saying is that it is either through misadventure, or inattention or inadvertence this that this is what has happened. Our decisionmakers, I believe, have made such grievous errors, whether out of whatever motivations, that in effect have eroded the inherent fiscal and monetary stability of our system. It is my intention, as chairman of this committee, to give for the first time full consideration to this issue, which is complex, but which up to now has hitherto been completely unaddressed, and I mean unaddressed by either one of our two bodies.

Mr. Speaker, my record will show my fears expressed consistently and, in fact, to the point where I have been both heavily criticized and ridiculed even by my own hometown papers, but that does not bother me. We are in a democracy, and I have enough judgment to know how to analyze criticism, determine its source and distinguish between the constructive and the malicious.

But what I am saying to my colleagues is that with that backdrop and with the lack of awareness on the average minds of our leadership, both congressional as well as executive branch, I think it will be compelling and a compulsory thing for us to at least have some attention while we agitate on this other more severe and more immediate crisis facing us domestically never forgetting that in today's world we cannot, we cannot, separate either. We live in such a contracted world that it is difficult to advise my colleagues how at the press of a button we can have anywhere from $300 to $400 billion chasing each other from London, to New York, to Paris, to Bonn, to Tokyo. The bad thing is that it is doing the same thing on a multiple, international front as some of our leading, huge corporate interests have been doing on the domestic, and that is trading what is known in industry as equity for debt.

Mr. Speaker, back home my father used to say, "You're broke, and you ain't going to get a loan from the bank unless you have collateral," and what we have now is the greatest reservoir of corporate debt in the history of any country. But in the meanwhile these what they call megadollars chasing each dollar are not chasing each other in the course of legitimate international trade, or the production of goods or the creation of employment opportunities, but money chasing money to make money on the speculative, highly volatile international exchange markets.

In 1971, when President Nixon took us off the so-called gold exchange, nobody in this country; I saw no newspaper that said that the President in effect has devalued the dollar in effect by 10 percent, but that is what he did in 1971, and unfortunately these are areas which for too long have been considered as if they are secret abodes of the high priests of bankers and banking and corporate finesse, but they are not any more than mathematics should be. Any human being, and in fact I would say that the average nonbanker could have shown a lot more wisdom, than the leading bankers have revealed in the last two decades, certainly a decade and a half, but the people are still sovereign, and, as I keep saying and said all along, "My colleagues, the Congress is not here for your convenience. The Banking Committee isn't here for the convenience of the banking industry, financial industry, corporate industry. We're here because we are the national, constitutionally-instituted, policymaking body, and our approach is the greatest interest of the greatest number of the basic national interest involved in a sound and safe financial system, fiscal and monetary, and that's it."

Mr. Speaker, we have forgotten our origins in the sense that we forgot to look at the laws the Congress allowed in order to afford the great privilege of chartering a bank, and those words are:

"You are chartered for public need and convenience."

"It be worthy," in the words of Shakespeare, "to not turn our back, look in the clouds scorning the base degrees by which we and you, the powerful financial leaders and accumulators of great wealth, have ascended."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

QADHAFI AND TERRORISM: THE DESERT COYOTE CONTINUES HIS BATTLE AGAINST THE WEST

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with my colleagues a disturbing State Department factsheet documenting Colonel Qadhafi's continuing involvement with terrorism. I commended President Reagan's April 1986 military operation against Libyan terrorist training facilities in response to Libya's direct involvement in the 1986 bombing of a disco in West Berlin that resulted in the death of two U.S. Army sergeants and injuries to 64 other Americans. However, I am concerned that Qadhafi has begun to play the role of "terror master" again. The wily colonel has recently added a new arrow to his quiver of terrorist tools.

Thanks to the good work of our intelligence services, Qadhafi's schemes to obtain poison chemicals for his terrorist and military plots have been revealed to the world. While the spread of chemical weapons is a threat to all of us, I cannot imagine a national leader who is more unpredictable and diabolical in his international intrigues and terrorist plots than Qadhafi.

While our allies around the world should march shoulder to shoulder with our Government in our efforts to shut down Qadhafi's poison factory, I believe that America may be forced to act alone in order to stem the colonel's efforts to add a terrible weapon to his already formidable arsenal. While diplomacy may prove to be the best solution to this most recent threat, and international cooperation in the struggle against the terrorism menace is essential, I believe that other options should not be ruled out by the administration in dealing with the Rabta chemical facility.

I urge my colleagues to carefully read the following excerpts from the Department of State factsheet concerning Libyan terrorism:

LIBYA'S QADHAFI CONTINUES SUPPORT FOR TERRORISM

LIBYA UNCHANGED

Despite a public posture of moderation, Libya continues to support terrorism. It has given aid to terrorist groups. It has also participated directly in at least one operation in Senegal. Libyan operatives have been active worldwide, especially in Africa, Latin America, and the Caribbean. Libya maintains training camps for foreign dissident groups. It has permitted the Palestinian terrorist group, the Abu Nidal Organization (ANO), to establish its headquarters in Libya. Libya has also abused diplomatic privileges by shipping arms through the diplomatic pouch and by storing explosives at its diplomatic missions.

Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qadhafi considers himself an agent of historical forces. He is implacably committted to ending US and other Western influence in the Third World, to unifying the Arab world, and to destroying the state of Israel. He sees Israel, the US, and other Western countries as barriers to his goals. To achieve these ends, Libya has employed threats, terrorism, and military aggression.

Since the US airstrikes in 1986 and Libya's military defeat in Chad in 1987, however, many believe Libya has chosen to operate through surrogate terrorist groups willing to strike at Western targets, rather than become directly involved in terrorism. For example, Libya has appealed to groups it supports to attack US and other Western targets. Qadhafi has also relied increasingly on aggressive diplomacy and on offers of cooperation and outright bribes. In the past, however, when Qadhafi has turned from subversion and terrorism to more conventional forms of diplomacy, he has eventually resumed his violent ways.

SUPPORT TO TERRORISTS

Qadhafi has provided safehaven, money, arms and at times logistical support over the years to Palestinian groups such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine—General Command and to other groups, both pro- and anti-PLO. These groups have conducted most of their operations against Israel and the occupied territories. The ANO, which transferred its headquarters to Libya in 1987, frequently conducts its operations outside the Middle East, including in Europe. Recently, the ANO has resumed its operations with deadly consequences.

The ANO conducted the July 1988 machinegun and grenade attack on the Greek cruise ship, The City of Poros. An apparently accidental car explosion earlier that same day in Athens was probably caused by a bomb intended for an attack planned to complement the cruise ship incident. Libya has been linked to these incidents. For example, a submachinegun recovered from the cruise ship and another from the bomb damaged car were purchased by Libya in 1976. According to Greek officials, a known ANO member linked to the attacks used a Libyan passport to enter Greece.

ANO terrorists have confessed to the May 1988 submachinegun and grenade attacks at the Acropole Hotel and Sudan Club in Khartoum that killed eight and wounded scores of other people. Under interrogation, they said they had come to attack US and British targets.

The ANO is also believed responsible for a car bomb which exploded prematurely in May near the Israeli Embassy in Nicosia, Cyprus, killing one of the two terrorists involved. An ANO gunman also confessed to the March 1988 attack on an Alitalia Airlines crew at the airport in Bombay in which a machinegun jammed and explosives failed to detonate—later claiming he intended to hit a US crew.

Several other groups that Libya supports have conducted terrorist operations against US and Western targets. At the time of the second anniversary of the US airstrikes against Libya, there was a series of attacks against US targets that were linked by circumstantial evidence to Libya. Just prior to these attacks, Qadhafi publicly predicted that progressives around the world would strike US facilities, but later denied any Libyan responsibility.

The Japanese Red Army (JRA) was responsible for the April 14, 1988 bombing outside a USO club in Naples. The attack—claimed under the covername "Organization of Jihad Brigades" and specifically linked to the US bombing raids of Libya two years before—killed five people including one US servicewoman and injured at least 20 persons. Italian authorities have linked the car used in the attack to a known JRA terrorist who was implicated in the June 1987 attack against the US Embassy in Rome.

A US Air Force communications facility near Torrejon, Spain was bombed on April 15, 1988. The US suspects involvement by Libyan sympathizers.

On April 14, 1988 gunmen set off explosives in the USIS binational center in Medellin, Colombia. The attack was claimed by members of the 19th of April Movement (M-19), which has received training and money from Libya.

The Revolutionary Movement Tupac Amaru (MRTA) claimed responsibility for two attacks against USIS binational centers on April 16, 1988 in Lima, Peru. While MRTA claimed these attacks were a protest against a Peruvian-Shell Oil Company agreement, we note that in 1986 it claimed responsibility for several attacks on US targets in Peru to protest US policy towards Libya shortly before the airstrikes.

A group with ties to Libya is the prime suspect in the April 19, 1988 bombing near the USIS binational cultural center in San Jose in which several were injured.

French authorities in late 1987 intercepted a 150-ton Libyan arms shipment, including surface-to-air missiles, intended for the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) in Northern Ireland. There is conclusive evidence that this shipment—the equivalent of 60 large truck-loads of munitions—originated in Libya. PIRA has used the SEMTEX explosives obtained from Libyan shipments in destructive bombing campaigns against both military and civilian targets in the UK and Western Europe. Last October, police uncovered a munitions cache believed to have come from an earlier Libyan shipment. The cache, hidden at a retirement home in West Belfast, included a Warsaw Pact-type flamethrower capable of incinerating a vehicle at up to 80 yards.

AGAINST HIS OWN

Although Qadhafi has intermittently—including in 1988—offered amnesty to Libyan dissidents, such expatriates continue to be targets of Libyan attacks. Eleven dissidents were killed in the first phase of executions ending in 1981. Another series of planned attacks were uncovered during 1984 and 1985. Assassins in these cases have sometimes used handguns supplied in country by Libyan diplomats. In 1987 two Libyan dissidents were assassinated in Europe and an attempt was made on the life of a third. In that last case, Austrian officials identified the local Libyan diplomatic mission as supporting the attack. In the fall of 1987, France and Switzerland both expelled Libyan agents suspected of plotting terrorist actions.

MIXING CHARM WITH VIOLENCE

Libya has a record of seeking to destabilize moderate Arab and African governments committed to a negotiated peace in the Middle East or linked to the West. During the 1983-1987 period, Libyan-backed assassination plots against President Mubarak of Egypt, former President Numeiri of Sudan, President Mobutu of Zaire, and President Habre of Chad were thwarted. On occasion, Qadhafi has alternated between plotting against moderate Arab and African leaders and reconciling with them to improve his own image.

QADHAFI'S DIPLOMATIC OFFENSIVE: REACHING FOR RESPECTABILITY

To recoup lost influence, Libya has undertaken a concerted diplomatic campaign to improve relations with the PLO, with its Arab neighbors, and with key African states, while preserving its traditional contacts with dissident, subversive, and terrorist groups in such countries. Libya now maintains an active relationship with all the North African states, and has recently resumed diplomatic relations as well with Chad, Zaire, and Senegal. In September 1987, Libya agreed to a cease-fire in its conflict with Chad over the Aozou Strip. While Libya has proclaimed its willingness to settle for a negotiated solution to this dispute, its continued occupation of the Aozou strip and its repeated overflights of Chadian territory indicate otherwise.

Libyan efforts are underway to reestablish a broader diplomatic presence elsewhere in Africa, including in such countries as Liberia, Sierra Leone and The Gambia. Qadhafi, determined not to be outdone by Arab rivals, hosted several visits to Tripoli by PLO leader Yassir Arafat, summits for rival Palestinian groups, and announced he intended to assume the financial responsibilities in the West Bank set aside last year by Jordan.

THE DRIVE FOR INFLUENCE

In Europe: Libya has sought to expand its influence in Europe by using the promise of economic and commercial benefit—principally in the petroleum sector—as political leverage. For example, Libya seeks to solicit ministerial visits through promises of progress on outstanding commercial issues such as unpaid Libyan debts. Libya also seeks to purchase political goodwill by holding out the prospect of expanded financial opportunities for companies and nationals of such countries. Libyan ability to keep such promises is limited, however, especially in view of the continued downturn in the international petroleum market. Libya is also pressing to regain the level of diplomatic representation it had in Europe prior to 1986 both for the respectability that will confer and to restore its security apparatus in Europe.

In Africa: Since late 1987, Libya has tried to increase its influence in Africa by combining aggressive diplomacy with intimidation. Qadhafi's long-term objectives are to weaken Western influence and to woo pro-Western regimes. Africa offers operational advantages—porous borders and an existing Libyan infrastructure—and has been a focal point for recent Libyan activity. Libya's commitment to supporting terrorist attacks against Western interests is reflected in an incident that occurred in Dakar last year, when the government of Senegal arrested two Libyan operatives on February 20, 1988 for carrying weapons and explosives into the Dakar airport from Benin. Subsequent to the arrests of these two, Benin expelled the head of the Libyan People's Bureau. The two were believed to have been planning to attack Western targets in Senegal.

Libya frequently uses friendly countries as bases to assist subversives or dissidents in countries hostile to Libya. Such countries have also served as transit points for dissidents enroute to Libya for military and political training. The most noteworthy example in recent years involves Libya's support to Chadian dissidents in Sudan. In the Senegal case, the territory of the country of Benin was used by Libya to smuggle arms, supplies and money into Senegal.

Elsewhere, Kenya ordered five Libyan diplomats out of the country in April 1987 in connection with a Kenyan court conviction on espionage charges of four Kenyan students recruited by a Libyan diplomat. Three Gambians working with Libya were convicted in June 1988 for plotting against the government in The Gambia.

In Latin America: Since as early as 1973, Libya has provided training to insurgent groups and political support to a broad spectrum of dissident organizations in Latin America and the Caribbean. Libya has provided support to the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. Libya employs its People's Bureaus in Panama, Nicaragua, and Cuba to collect information and to encourage willing subversive organizations to carry out attacks. It appears to use Panama as its base in the Western Hemisphere. Libya uses Cuba as its transportation hub.

Several Latin groups Libya supports are prime suspects in recent strikes against US targets. Although there exists no evidence of direct Libyan involvement in these attacks, the timing and associations lead us to suspect a Libyan link in the four attacks in April of last year on binational centers in Columbia, Peru, and Costa Rica. All of these attacks occurred on or near the second anniversary of the 1986 US bombing of Libya.

In the Pacific and Asia: Qadhafi has sought to expand his influence in Asia and in the Pacific at the expense of the West by sponsoring radical individuals and groups whose activities exacerbate local problems. Libya has given paramilitary training and finanical support to dissident groups in Indonesia, New Caledonia, Thailand, and the Philippines, including in the latter the Moro Liberation Front. Two terrorists groups linked to Libya, the ANO and the JRA, have conducted operations against Western interests in Asia.

An ANO member attacked the Alitalia crew bus in Bombay on March 25, 1988. Although there is no indication that Libya ordered the attack, it has provided logistical support to ANO operations in Asia before—most notably the attempt to hijack Pan American Flight 73 in Karachi in 1986.

The JRA launched several nearly simultaneous attacks against the US, Canadian, and Japanese Embassies in Jakarta in 1986 which coincided with the Tokyo economic summit.

Libya's efforts to establish an infrastructure capable of supporting terrorism, however, have been weakened by its inability to open new embassies and by Australia's closing of the Libyan People's Bureau in May 1987. The Australian Prime Minister said at the time, "There is no plausible explanation in terms of geography or legitimate national interest for Libyan activity in this region".

In the United States: Libya also has attempted to seek influence illegally within the United States and may have been involved in possible acts of subversion there as well.

In July 1988, two alleged Libyan intelligence agents along with four other Libyans and one Moroccan were indicted before a federal court in Alexandria, Virginia on charges of conspiring to violate the US economic embargo against Libya. The defendants, who were associated with the People's Committee for Libyan Students, had diverted funds which were to be used for supporting Libyan students in the US to financing political activities such as anti-American demonstrations in the US and conferences of American dissidents in Libya. The defendants—with the exception of alleged Libyan intelligence agent Mousa Hawamda who fled after posting bail—pleaded guilty to the charges.

Last April, police in New Jersey apprehended Yu Kikumura, a member of the Libyan-linked JRA, who had three anti-personnel bombs in his car. The bombs were likely intended for a terrorist attack coinciding with the second anniversary of the US retaliatory air strikes on Libya. Kikumura was found guilty of transporting explosives by a US District Court in late November 1988.

In Chicago in December 1987, the leader and four other members of the "El Rukns" street gang were convicted of planning terrorist activities in 1986 and were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to 80 years. The gang members, who had obtained an anti-tank rocket, had plans to target airplanes and government facilities, as well as to assassinate American politicans. According to US prosecutors, the gang claimed it expected to receive $2.5 million from Libya's Colonel Qadhafi in return for its actions. Although Libya was not charged in the case and its officials denied any involvement, gang members were known to have had contact with Libyan representatives.

OUTLOOK FOR LIBYAN INVOLVEMENT WITH TERRORISM

Support for terrorism has been a consistent feature of Libyan foreign policy for nearly twenty years. Past experience with Qadhafi suggests he will shift away from his current diplomatic offensive when its fails to produce desired results. If the past is indicative, Libya will continue to share with international terrorists and with other extermist groups the goal of supplanting US and other Western influence worldwide, but particularly in the Middle East. As recently as September, in response to a question from the Western media about Libyan arms shipments to the PIRA, Qadhafi replied that it was Libya's policy to support such groups, since they were legitimately involved in the struggle against colonialism. Libya's continuing support for organizations such as the PIRA and the ANO, as well as its links to the JRA, will keep it squarely in the ranks of state sponsors of terrorism.

CHEMICAL WEAPONS—A NEW DIMENSION TO THE THREAT

Evidence now indicates that Libya is on the verge of undertaking full-scale production of chemical warfare agents. A large complex in a remote area about 80 kilometers southwest of Tripoli, near Rabta, has been constructed for this purpose. When this site is fully operational, it will be the largest chemical warfare agent production plant in the Third World—potentially making tens of tons per day of mustard gas and nerve agents.

An adjacent metal fabrication facility is equipped with precision materials to manufacture components for a variety of air- and ground-delivered munitions. Other facilities are involved with filling and storing chemical weapons.

In a speech delivered in October 1988, Libyan leader Qadhafi claimed that the facility at Rabta was intended to produce pharmaceuticals—not chemical warfare agents. Qadhafi also proposed opening the complex for international inspection. Contrary to Qadhafi's assertion, however, this site was clearly intended primarily for chemical warfare production. The specialized equipment, building design, and security there far exceed the requirements of a commercial plant. Because it would be relatively easy for Libya to disguise the plant's true purpose by modifying the piping and other internal features of the plant before opening it for inspection—particularly inspection by non-experts—a one time inspection of the sort offered by the Libyans would be inadequate.

The prospect of Libya's acquisition of a chemical weapons capability is profoundly disturbing given reports Libya used chemical weapons during 1987 in its war with Chad. It is also disturbing in light of Libya's continuing support for terrorism and Libya's history of transferring weapons to others. The United States has called on all nations to halt any contributions they might be making to Libya's chemical weapons program.

A BILL TO AMEND THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1986

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reintroduce today legislation to allow all homeowners the option to keep, tax free, up to $125,000 of the profits, from the sale of a principal residence regardless of age. As many of my colleagues are aware, the current eligibility for the one-time capital gains tax exemption extends to only those 55 years of age or older.

While the economic recovery in this last decade has sharply reduced the overall rate of inflation, housing costs has continued to rise more rapidly than incomes or prices for most other commodities. At a time when low- and middle-income couples are in positions to save less, and are limited in their investments by the 1986 Tax Reform Act, a home is more than shelter. It is their future economic security.

My bill would allow Americans the freedom to decide at which point in their lives they could best utilize the one-time exclusion: A young family making the move from their starter home to a larger residence; middle-aged parents wanting to send their children to college and needing access to the capital of their single most valuable investment; or single, recently divorced or widowed homeowners who may no longer be able to afford or need a multiperson residence.

This bill would also have the direct effect of freeing up the housing market in cases where homeowners a few years under age 55 are holding onto their homes so as to be able to take advantage of the one-time exclusion. This increased availability would in turn foster lower cost housing and enable those who could not previously afford to own their own home a better opportunity to do so.

Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues are considering an elimination or reduction of the one-time capital gains tax exemption as a deficit reduction alternative. I believe they are moving in the wrong direction. I request that the full text of my bill be inserted at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I invite my colleagues to review and cosponsor this important measure.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the section heading and subsection (a) of section 121 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to one-time exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence by individul who has attained age 55) are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 121. ONE-TIME EXCLUSION OF GAIN FROM SALE OF PRINCIPAL RESIDENCE.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—At the election of the taxpayer, gross income does not include gain from the sale or exchange of property if, during the 5-year period ending on the date of the sale or exchange, such property has been owned and used by the taxpayer as his prinicpal residence for periods aggregating 3 years or more."

(b)(1) Paragraph (1) of section 121(d) of such Code (relating to special rules) is amended by striking out "age, holding, and use" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "holding and use".

(2) Paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 121(d) of such Code are each amended by striking out "subsection (a)(2)" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)".

(3) The table of sections for part III of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by striking out the item relating to section 121 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 121. One-time exclusion of gain from sale of principal residence."

(4) Sections 1033(h)(3), 1034(l), 1038(e)(1)(A), 1250(d)(7)(B), and 6012(c) of such Code are each amended by striking out "by individual who has attained age 55".

(c) The amendments made by this Act shall apply to sales or exchanges after December 31, 1988, in taxable years ending after such date.

SAVE THE MORTGAGE INTEREST TAX DEDUCTION

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to announce today that I am joining my colleague, MARGE ROUKEMA, in the introduction of a resolution expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that the home mortgage interest deduction should not be curtailed.

The housing industry is crucial to the Nation's economic health, and the mortgage interest deduction is the most important incentive we have for construction and homeownership. Unfortunately, for the first time in half a century, the percentage of people in the United States owning their homes has declined. Young families trying to capture their share of the American dream are particularly hard hit. The percentage of people in the United States between the ages of 25 and 29 who own their own home has declined from 43 percent in 1976 to only 38 percent in 1987.

Despite this alarming trend, there are some in the Congress who clearly want to further limit the mortgage interest deduction. And, as pressures begin to build to raise revenues, those pressures are going to get more intense, thus making this target more inviting.

There are some who say that this will never happen. Well, that's what many people were saying a few years ago, but in the 1986 Tax Reform Act the Congress actually capped this once sancrosant deduction at $1 million. Now, this obviously doesn't affect Main Street America. But it is the proverbial camel's nose under the tent and it's time to stop the camel dead in its tracks.

As we introduce this resolution, I want to take this opportunity to thank the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, who has given me his personal assurances that he will personally oppose any further tampering with this deduction. But, despite his assurances and his considerable influence, I'm not ready to declare total victory and tell the troops to go home.

This resolution will serve as a message to those who would seek to curtail this important deduction. I'm pleased that my colleague from Oregon, PETER DEFAZIO, has agreed to cosponsor my measure. The bottom line of this resolution is simple: it would be the sense of the House of Representatives that the law regarding the Federal income tax deduction for mortgage interest should not be further restricted. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important measure.

UNDER THE GUN, UNDER THE KNIFE

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to an editorial written by Steve Lopez, that recently appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer. The article addresses the issue of gun control, but from an unusual perspective. In light of the tragic California playground murders, I highly recommend the following article to my colleagues:

UNDER THE GUN, UNDER THE KNIFE

(By Steve Lopez)

It was 8:30 p.m. Christmas Eve. Dr. Julieta Grosh had just sewn up a stabbing victim. Before she could rest, her next patient came through emergency at Temple University Hospital.

He was 20 years old and he had been shot in the neck. His carotid artery was blown away and blood was filling his neck.

"His neck was virtually blowing up before our very eyes," Grosh says.

"He was conscious, saying the usual things: I don't want to die. Help me."

By 2 a.m. Christmas Day, she was done with him. Grosh took a vein from his leg and made him a new artery. He would be fine, leaving the hospital in time for New Year's Day.

He was one of 238 gunshot victims treated at Temple in 1988, half of them by Grosh. It cost about $10,000 to save his life, and he had no medical insurance. Which makes him typical of gunshot victims at Temple and at hospitals across the country.

It's an issue you seldom hear about in gun-control debates. What is the cost and who is paying? According to a study published in the Nov. 25 Journal of the American Medical Association, the cost is staggering, and the public is paying.

A HEFTY TAB

The cost is at least $1.5 billion a year, and taxpayers are picking up 85.6 percent of the tab, according to Michael J. Martin, the San Francisco doctor who wrote the medical journal article. Only 14.4 percent of gunshot victims have private insurance or can pay out of their own pocket.

"I was just interested in finding out who's paying," says Martin, who conducted the study for the Clinical Epidemiology Program at the University of California in San Francisco.

"If we're paying for the inquiries, we should have a say on the availability of firearms. The issue of firearm restrictions is not simply one of individual rights any longer, since taxpayers pay the majority of costs."

Martin and two other doctors studied 1984 statistics from San Francisco General Hospital, where all gunshot victims are taken in that city. It cost $905,809 to treat 131 patients.

That doesn't include ambulance services, physician fees or follow-up care. Adding those in, and extrapolating for a nationwide figure. Martin estimated the 1984 cost of treating firearms injuries at $1 billion. There were 62,075 firearm injuries nationwide that year, and 31,351 deaths.

Adding four years of inflation and rising medical costs, Martin says, the 1988 cost is "at least $1.5 billion, probably much higher."

RISING TIDE

Grosh, a Temple surgeon for 18 years, says there are more and more gunshot patients at her hospital all the time. It used to be mostly stabbing victims, but no more.

Often she'll work a gunshot patient, head home, and before she can get to sleep, she's called back to the hospital for another.

She says the bullets she cuts out of people keep getting bigger, ripping wider paths through the bodies.

"Not long ago I did a neck, I lost him on the table. I'd never seen a bullet like that. It was huge and it had like crustaceans on it. . . . And they're getting more accurate. We're getting a lot of chest work lately."

Grosh says she carried a gun for protection when she was a student, but after what she's seen, she never will again. She joined a gun-control group formed by the wife of James Brady, who was shot in the attempt on President Reagan's life.

EMOTIONAL TOLL

"It's because of seeing this, it sounds like a cliche, but this carnage. When you have to tell a mother her 15-year-old is dead, or a cop's wife, I don't care how many times you've done it, it's awful. And if the person didn't have a gun, it wouldn't have happened.

"This is bull—, if you'll excuse my French, when they say guns don't get us killed, people do. That's bull—. Family members are killing each other, children are being killed. We even saw a case here once where a couple was fighting over drugs, one of them pulled a gun, the other shielded himself with a child and the child was blown away."

Total 1988 costs for Temple hospital—one of several that treats gunshot victims in Philadelphia—were not available. But since it cost nearly $1 millon in 1984 to treat 131 gunshot victims in San Francisco, the cost of treating Temple's victims in 1988 could be $2 million or more.

Grosh says Martin's figure—85.6 percent of the costs are picked up by a government program or simply eaten by public hospitals—sounds about right for Temple.

"A lot of it is just written off. The hospital's always in the red."

Grosh is glad we're into January now. Every year, she says, it seems a lot of people shoot each other over the holidays.

ILLEGAL HARVESTING

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, which I first introduced in April 1988, to require the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to develop to plan to halt the illegal harvesting of migratory waterfowl. While it is clear that illegal harvesting is not the sole cause of the dramatic declines in the duck population, it nonetheless is a contributing element to this problem which deserves serious attention.

It is no secret what first spurred me to introduce this legislation. In February 1988, the St. Paul Pioneer Press reported a grim story of lawbreaking and wildlife slaughter. Although the articles focused on illegal duck harvesting in Louisiana, I soon learned that the problem was nationwide. Law enforcement officials from the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service with whom I met described the situation as critical.

In response to the dramatic reductions in the duck population—the total duck population has declined at a rate of more than 20 percent since the year 1969—the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has taken some important actions. This past fall, the Service instituted a major cutback in the hunting season, reducing its length by 25 percent. In addition, bag limits have been cut from four to three in most parts of the country. Reports also have indicated that the Service has stepped up its enforcement of the wildlife laws. I welcome these actions and what appears to be a renewed emphasis in this area.

I also believe that my legislation would be an important addition to what the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has already accomplished, by placing a clearer focus on the illegal harvesting question. The bill would require the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to:

Research and develop methods to accurately determine the number of migratory waterfowl that are being harvested illegally each year in the United States;

Develop a plan to increase its law enforcement presence and better coordinate its efforts with those of appropriate States agencies in efforts to halt illegal harvesting of migratory waterfowl; and Recommend whether the Pittman-Robertson funds should be withheld from States that are not in compliance with U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service regulations on illegal harvesting.

The Fish and Wildlife Service is required to report its findings and recommendations to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and to the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works within 90 days of enactment.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues in the House to examine this issue and give full consideration to cosponsoring my legislation. Congress in 1989 must place a greater priority on environment issues than it has over the past few years. Setting the groundwork for halting the illegal harvesting of migratory waterfowl would be a good start.

NEW EAST-WEST AGREEMENT FOR PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, on January 16, 35 nations, including the United States and the Soviet Union and all European countries except Albania, signed a new East-West agreement that is being widely hailed for its protection of human rights. The new agreement ends this session of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [CSCE] and allows members of NATO and the Warsaw Pact to begin the conventional stability talks on conventional forces in March. As part of the accord, the signatories also agreed to a Soviet proposal to hold a human rights conference in Moscow in 1991, a long-sought Soviet goal. Outgoing Reagan administration officials characterized the agreement as the most significant new accord on human rights since the Helsinki Final Act was signed in 1975.

Although the signing of this pact was indeed a significant occasion and produced some of the strongest commitments yet from the Soviet Bloc to respect human rights, hardliners in several Warsaw Pact countries have already violated the pledges their governments undertook in Vienna. Unfortunately, these developments do not bode well for the effectiveness of the new CSCE agreement. Against this backdrop, it is incumbent upon the Bush administration to ensure that the Soviet Union and its allies comply with this agreement. If they do not, our policies must be adjusted accordingly.

Three articles about the CSCE accords have recently come to my attention. I urge my colleagues to read a January 18 editorial, "Human Rights Emphasis Doesn't End With Shultz," in the Omaha World-Herald. I also commend to them a January 10 editorial, "Rethinking Human Rights," in the Washington Times, and a January 10 op-ed piece, "Is Moscow Due That Rights Session?" by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS] in the same newspaper. These three articles provide an excellent overview of the opportunities and problems which arise from the new agreement.

[From the Omaha World-Herald, Jan. 18, 1989]

BAKER FOLLOWS THE THEME: HUMAN RIGHTS EMPHASIS DOESN'T END WITH SHULTZ

Secretary of State George Shultz, in a speech at the Vienna human rights conference, touched on one of the basic themes of the Reagan years. Eastern European nations, he said, must comply with human rights agreements if they want better relations with the United States.

A similar theme emerged in the testimony of James Baker, who will succeed Shultz in the Bush administration, to the confirmation panel of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. One of America's chief foreign policy tasks, Baker said, is to inspire constructive and responsible behavior on the part of the Soviet Union.

The point is crucial. The more repression and police-state tyranny the Soviet bloc countries carry on within their borders, the less they can be counted on to respect the rights of people in other countries.

There is something about authoritarian rulers, especially when they are driven by ideology, that often manifests itself in attempts to extend their power. That was the pattern with Adolf Hitler, Josef Stalin, Benito Mussolini and General Tojo of Japan. It has been a characteristic of the reigns of Fidel Castro, Moammar Gadhafi, Kim Il Sung and Ho Chi Minh.

Shultz did not miss the irony in the fact that Czechoslovakia and East Germany signed human rights protocols at almost the same time their troops and secret police units were putting down human rights demonstrations. Scores of people in Prague and Leipzig were abused in violation of the Helsinki Accords. The contradictions in such behavior, as Shultz pointed out, are glaring.

The Soviet Union and its allies—especially Poland, Romania and Hungary—are deeply in debt to Western nations. Their economies, top-heavy with the steel, coal and cement plants that the Stalinists considered essential, cannot compete on the world market. The standard of living falls while debt mounts. Sparks of political pluralism flash amid the dissatisfaction, too often to be put out.

Change, however, is in the air. Hungary has announced a bold plan to allow non-Communist parties to compete in elections against the Communist regime. Top Polish officials have considered legalizing the Solidarity union for a two-year trial period. The Soviet Union has scheduled national elections March 26 for a new national assembly, with an option for multicandidate races.

The Soviet bloc desperately needs Western investments and loans. It also needs new markets for its goods—if the goods can be improved to the point of being marketable. Mikhail Gorbachev, moreover, wants good relations with the West to help him reduce the burden of financing the world's largest military machine.

The Cold War with the United States has been a staggering burden for the Soviets. The Armenian earthquake, poor grain harvests and the war in Afghanistan have added to Soviet woes.

By signaling his essential agreement with Shultz, Secretary-designate Baker made it clear that the American insistence on human rights progress will continue. The day when Eastern Europe reacts to human rights demonstrators with water cannon, clubs and tear gas has been too slow to fade.

[From the Washington Times, Jan. 10, 1989]

RETHINKING HUMAN RIGHTS

Ronald Reagan crowned his "new thinking" about the Soviet Union by promising that his successor would attend a human rights conference in Moscow in 1991. This gives the Bush administration two years to do something that no president has done this century: define clearly what the United States means by "human rights" and use that definition as a measuring stick of Soviet human-rights progress.

President Reagan and the State Department report that virtually all political and religious prisoners in the Soviet Union have been freed and that less than a dozen Soviet citizens are being denied emigration to join their families. The State Department reports that the Soviets have stopped jamming the Voice of America and that Jewish emigration is at its highest since 1980. "They have made significant progress [on human rights]," State Department spokesman Phyllis Oakley says. "I think that's clear . . ."

Maybe, maybe not. As George Orwell observed in his essay, "Politics and the English Language," words like human rights, democracy, and freedom mean one thing to Westerners and something entirely different to Soviets. Traditionally, "human rights" conferences have served to obscure these differences, rather than to highlight them, and have rendered these terms progressively more meaningless as a result.

The United States learned this lesson in the recent past. In 1979, the US and Soviet Union had for years been celebrating detente. Human rights in the Soviet Union appeared to be improving, President Carter signed the SALT II accord and hugged Leonid Brezhnev, and US-Soviet trade was at its all-time zenith. Soon after, the Red Army stormed into Afghanistan and began a genocidal campaign that has claimed millions of innocent lives.

Observing human rights conditions in the Soviet Union should remind us that the litmus test for a sound foreign policy is whether it serves the just interests of the United States, not whether it moves a foreign power to allow press freedom, religious observances or political gatherings. Otherwise, American national security policy will be hostage to the whims of whatever clever communist aparatchik is in power.

Ronald Reagan has observed this caveat with respect to international treaties, which the Soviets routinely violate. Ironically, he hasn't been as scrupulous in discussing human rights, because he has accepted Soviet human-rights rhetoric without determining whether deeds matched words.

That's a shame, because a sound definition of human rights can crystallize the most important difference between the Soviet and American systems, the difference upon which a realistic foreign policy must rest. We say that men are free by nature; that they have inalienable, God-given rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We believe that government derives its legitimacy from the consent of the governed. The Soviets take an opposite view. They regard freedom and rights as gifts from the state. Their constitution says as much. We say the state exists to serve man. They say man exists to serve the state.

The United States has been embarrassed in the past when it has interpreted Kremlin gestures as signs of moral and political convergence. We hope Secreteary of State-designate James Baker will make full use of the opportunity to define human rights clearly, in terms of economic, political and cultural freedoms—and will use that definition to call the Kremlin's bluff when it comes to terms such as "democracy" and "freedom." We also hope that the Bush administration will judge the Soviet Union not on the basis of right rhetoric, but on the basis of actual behavior in matters of our own national interest.

IS MOSCOW DUE THAT RIGHTS SESSION?

(By Mickey Edwards)

[Mickey Edwards, a Republican representative from Oklahoma, is chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee.]

The recent decision by President Reagan to endorse the Soviet Union's claim that it is a legitimate host for a 1991 conference on human rights goes far beyond a bit of backroom cheerleading for Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's campaign for internal reform: It recognizes the Soviet state—yesterday's "evil empire"—as a guarantor of the rights of its citizens and a striver for full recognition of human dignity. That's quite a leap and one that raises the question of whether the Russians have indeed moved so far in so short a time.

Is the Soviet Union, in fact, a born-again believer in human rights?

One thing is certain: In the words of a once-popular novelty song, strange things are happening. And nowhere stranger than behind the Iron Curtain. In fact, a visit to the Soviet Union today is a roller-coaster experience. A single week in Moscow and Leningrad can shock your system with alternating currents of surprise, joy and despair.

As vice chairman of the House Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, I recently returned from a week-long series of meetings with Soviet leaders in Moscow and in Leningrad. I had been invited to take part in talks between members of the Helsinki Commission on Human Rights and members of the Supreme Soviet.

The fact that the meetings were even taking place was momentous. Although there is no real parallel between the U.S. Congress, with its separate and considerable powers, and the Soviet version of a legislature, this was nonetheless the first time members of Congress and the Supreme Soviet had met together on a substantive issue. It was also the first time any representatives of the United States had been invited by the Soviets to discuss human rights questions. For years, in fact, the Soviets had denounced every mention by the United States of Russian human rights violations as interference in the U.S.S.R.'s internal affairs.

Not only had the Russians initiated the meetings, but it was clear from the outset that the topic was not to be human rights in general, but Soviet policy toward its own citizens. Two or three times the Soviet delegates made half-hearted attempts to suggest parallel human rights deficiencies in the United States (homelessness, for example, and the arrest of clergymen who participated in the Salvadoran sanctuary movement), but those were fleeting blips on the screen.

The Soviets understood very well that we were there to talk about them—about Jews in Kharkov, Catholics in the Ukraine, political prisoners in the Soviet Gulag, denial of emigration permits. They understood that these talks were asymmetrical, and they accepted that.

There were excuses, of course (abuses were invariably blamed on earlier regimes), and at times the Soviets were more than a little disingenuous. ("Gosh, we'd sure like to learn what you folks do to make sure you always know what your constituents are thinking.")

There was even some fervent advocacy of an occasional Soviet viewpoint (for example, the Russians firmly believe—as do many Americans, I suspect—that journalists ought to be held accountable for the truth of their reports). But the clear message (whether it was sincere is a separate matter) was one of Soviet eagerness to confess failings and to try to do better.

In many ways, this new openness in discussing human rights was a heady and disorienting experience.

There, at one lunch, were representatives of the Ukrainian Catholic Church (which has been denied recognition by the Soviet state), and of the Russian Orthodox Church (which is increasingly accepted by the Russians as a de facto "house religion," even though it, too, feels the sting of the government's restrictions on religious practice). And, on the other side of the table, sharing their borsht and black bread, were official representatives of the Soviet State—the people who deny the Russian people the full range of religious experience.

And there was a reception in Moscow at which top party and government leaders mingled, for the first time, with refuseniks, dissidents and leaders of the semirevolutionary movements in Lithuania and Estonia. Here, the publishers of underground journals; there Ivan Laptev, the ebullient editor of Izvestia.

So what does all this mean? Not long ago, Russians marked (and some celebrated) the millennium of Christianity in Russia. Has the millennium—the proverbial "that will be the day"—arrived as well?

On that, a few words of caution:

For one thing, there is less a willingness to accept responsibility for current and ongoing Soviet repression than there is a willingness to concede that Stalin and Leonid Brezhnev did things wrong. At one point, sitting across from Mr. Laptev in the conference room at Izvestia, I was driven in frustration to ask if he foresaw a day when Soviet citizens might be as free to criticize current policies as they now are to find fault with policies of the past.

His answer was something about the difficulty in getting information about current policy, particularly in the areas of defense and foreign affairs.

And there is an unwillingness to move from the specific to the general. In my remarks to the closing plenary session of our four-day meeting in Moscow, I cautioned that this country's interest was not limited to the emigration of a few specific individuals, but to general acceptance of the principle that any citizen should be free to leave whenever he or she chooses that we were concerned not only about specific instances of religious prohibitions but about the general principle of religious freedom for all Soviet citizens. While the Russians have begun to move toward satisfaction of U.S. demands in the specific cases we continually put forth, there is less progress toward accepting such freedoms as a general principle of government.

In assessing how much of the so-called Gorbachev reforms are real, we must break them down into three separate components: glasnost (or openness), perestroika (or restructuring) and democratization.

On the first, there is no question that there is a change in Russia. Soviet citizens have more access to the news, more ability to critize their leadership, more freedom of expression. It is clearly not a Western-style definition of freedom, but there is certainly more freedom than before. Russian citizens remain highly skeptical, referring to similar relaxations during the Nikita Khrushchev years, and they ask such questions as: "If a cannibal begins to use a knife and fork, is that progress?", but that there has been some progress in opening the society is beyond doubt.

There has been less success with economic restructuring. Russian workers have developed a shoulder-shrugging indifference to their assignments, and years of cynicism aren't easily washed away. Despite Mr. Gorbachev's speeches and shakeups in the Politburo, shelves remain empty and long lines remain standard experiences for big-city shoppers.

Russian dissidents I met with in Moscow and Leningrad give President Reagan much of the credit for the new Soviet reforms.

As they see it, when Mr. Reagan declared at Reykjavik his intention to push forward with development of the Strategic Defense Initiative, and Mr. Gorbachev vowed to participate in an escalated high-tech competition, the Soviet leader found that his lagging economy simply wasn't up to it.

The response, as they see it, was a new push for an economic restructuring, which simply failed to get off the dime, largely because of worker apathy. So, to try to stimulate the economy, the scenario goes, Mr. Gorbachev was forced to try to find a way to give Russian workers some sense that they had a stake in the success of his reforms. And thus Mr. Reagan gave birth to glasnost.

Whatever Mr. Reagan's role, it seems evident that without a revived sense of involvement by Soviet farmers, clerks and factory workers, perestroika isn't going anywhere.

Buy if there is some progress in opening the society, and less in hyping the economy, there is virtually none in introducing true democratization.

One Leningrad couple described the Gorbachev efforts as "putting lipstick on a corpse." One example in Leningrad: a disrupted silent vigil, which resulted in participants languishing in Soviet jails for up to two weeks, a great improvement over going to the Gulag but not democracy as we know it.

Dissidents we talked to laughed about the so-called "elections" for local party leaders, in which each candidate would have to be approved in advance by the party. In fact, they said, the result might even be a worsening of the economy, since workers might be expected to vote against whichever candidate seemed most likely to make them work harder and produce more.

Democratization in the broader sense of self-determination is clearly not in the cards any time soon, as revealed in the recent Gorbachev crackdown on the Soviet Union's Baltic republics, which had the temerity to suggest that, absent matters of foreign policy and national defense, they would pretend to be relatively autonomous, much like states in the United States. That is clearly not what the Kremlin's leaders had in mind.

It is impossible to return from the Soviet Union without a recognition that things have indeed changed, enough so that that vast country which has for so long been an enigma to those of us on this side of the Iron curtain now seems to be an even greater enigma to those inside the country, where iron-clad rules have been replaced by confusion and the nation's leaders are seen to be walking a tightrope but with no indication of whether there is a net below. Russia has indeed changed.

But is also seems clear that acceptance of the Soviet Union as an equal partner in the struggle for human rights is greatly premature. It is one thing to respond to worldwide pleas and allow more refuseniks to leave; it is something altogether different to accept, as freedom-loving countries do, that all citizens are free to leave if and when they choose. It is one thing to grant a permit for a Bible study here or a church bazaar there; it is something altogether different to accept the right of people to worship where, when and how they please.

This is a Soviet Union in which, to advance democratization, government leaders purge the names of their predecessors from public buildings. It is a Soviet Union in which earnest, and probably sincere, officials talk human rights while they bug the hotel rooms even of guests invited to talk about human rights.

They're trying, but they still don't quite get it.

Should the United States encourage the Soviet Union to continue to move toward a Western style of governing?

Without question. But is is simply wrong—and probably counterproductive—to give the Russia of today the American stamp of approval as a legitimate partner in the struggle for human rights.

The Bush administration should rethink this one and suggest that the United States will grant Mr. Gorachev his long-sought legitimacy only when Russia indeed understands and champions the full range of freedoms for its long-suffering people.

WOMEN'S AND MEN'S CAUCUSES FOR CONGRESSMAN ED TOWNS HONOR NETTIE LARK

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 24, 1988, the Women's and Men's Caucuses for Congressman EDOLPHUS "ED" TOWNS held their annual dinner dance at the Fleur De Lis Restaurant. As part of this annual event, the caucuses chose to honor Nettie Lark.

Nettie Lark has dedicated most of her adult life to the education and cultural enrichment of children. She was born in Mobile, AL. She received her undergraduate degree from Alabama State University, master's degree from Jersey City State College, post graduate work at Bank Street College and Fordham University. Presently, she is working on an advanced degree at Brooklyn College. Her educational career started in the Montclair public schools and Seton Hall University High School Head Start. Her second educational experience was in the State of Maryland. While working there, she organized the first female drill team and the first Black Studies Club at her school.

Also, she was appointed department chair. During the summer months, Mrs. Lark taught in Upward Bound at the University of Maryland.

After the CEDAR component was added, she became the administrative assistant. Later she moved to South Carolina, where she became head of an in-shcool suspension program. After 2 years, she was selected to attend Johns Hopkins University or training to help administer a pilot program in the Columbia Public Schools. Her main responsibility was to train teachers how to use different learning strategies to improve their students' academic performance.

While living in South Carolina, Mrs. Lark met and married Charles Lark, who was a teacher in Brooklyn. She became an instant mother to 10-year-old Courtney who is now a freshman at Delaware State College. The family moved to Brooklyn in 1982. Within a few years she became a regular appointed teacher. Most of her educational experience was in East New York at Public School 224 and 260 where she became known as a tough disciplinarian, an excellent teacher, and a dedicated community worker. While at Public School 224, Mrs. Lark was a cluster teacher with administration duties. She organized an African Dance Group in each school which rehearsed before school, after school, and during the lunch hour. Presently, Mrs. Lark is employed in the most improved school district in the city, District 16, where Dr. Minta Spain is the superintendent. She is working in the early childhood unit at the district office.

Extracurricular activities include being a member of the Concord Baptist Church, the Sisterhood of Concord, Delta Sigma Theta Sorority, Phi Delta Kappa, New York State Association of Black School Educators, United Federation of Teachers, East Flatbush Friends of Education, Jack and Jill of America, Inc., and Bedford Stuyvesant Lioness Club.

Some of Mrs. Lark's awards for outstanding community service and excellence in education were given by the following organizations: Kappa Alpha Psi—presented by a Maryland Chapter and Congressman John Conyers, University of Maryland LINKS, porfiled by WBOC TV and WJZ TV, Jack and Jill, Brooklyn Teens and Mothers, and the PTA of Public School 224.

Mrs. Lark's favorite motto is: Obstacles are what you see when you take your eyes off the prize.

U.S.-U.S.S.R. HIGH SCHOOL EXCHANGE PROGRAM

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to say how proud I am of Bethesda-Chevy Chase High School [B-CC] and its principal, Nancy H. Powell. B-CC, one of our country's preeminent public secondary institutions, found in my congressional district, is among the first schools in the United States to participate in the newly estabished U.S.-U.S.S.R. High School Academic Partnership Program. Members may recall that this program, created to help improve Soviet-American relations, is one of the results of the Moscow summit last May.

For the next month, 15 Soviet students from Moscow School No. 45 will attend B-CC and live with American families. Next month, 11 Russian language students will go to the Soviet Union to attend classes at the Moscow school and live with Soviet families for a month. When this 3-year program has been completed, 1,500 students from each of our countries will have visited and studied in the other. Clearly such a program has manifest benefits, most important among them the establishment of a better understanding of each other's country, culture, and beliefs.

I would like to welcome to the United States Margarita Babayan, Pavel Cherenkov, Yelena Kareyeva, Pavel Kollakov, Marina Kurennaya, Nikolai Levchenko, Kseniya Manyushis, Maria Maysuradze, Anastasia Nemirovskaya, Natalia Oreshina, Natalia Patkina, Nikita Pisnyachevskiy, Aleksei Rybnikov, Aleksei Sorokin, and Olga Vasyukova, as well as their teachers, Aleksandr Zalmanovich Bessmertnyi and Olga Konstantinovna Postnikova.

The host families, all of whom reside in the Eighth Congressional District, are David and Ludmila Asher and their son, Jacob; Jim and Judy Blaha and their daughter, Amber; Bob and Diane Ursano and their daughter, Anna; Ronald and Mary Dee Bombick and their son, Andrew; Ross and Natalie Cannon and their daughter, Stacy; Judith Plesset and her son, Aaron Gee-Clough; Marilyn Hathway and her son, Steven; Robert and Joyce Hershey and their daughter, Kendra; Gary and Monique Milhollin and their son, Elliott; Edward and Anne Roy and their sons, Christian and John; David and Debbie Shipler and their daughter, Laura; Jerry and Louise Weiner and their son, Aaron; Peter and Sydney Tredick and their daughter, Heather; Joan Wallace and her sons, Dave and Ted Bardach; Sherry Drilling and her daughter, Stephanie; Jenny Portlock and her son, Philip; and Alan and Cathy Olson and their son, Nels.

B-CC students who will be traveling to the Soviet Union are Maia Bloomfield, Stacy Cannon, Lisa Cooper, Naida Ferroukhi, Star Hill, Peter Mansfield, Elliott Milhollin, Gabriel Miller, Kevin Moyers, Courtney Smith, and Jennifer Williams. Accompanying them will be B-CC teachers James J. Biedron and Regina Massarotti.

I know that all of those who participate will find this to be an interesting and exciting experience, and I look forward to welcoming a new group of exchange students in the near future.

AMBASSADOR JEANE KIRKPATRICK SPEAKS OUT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, once again our articulate former United Nations Ambassador, Jeane Kirkpatrick, has spoken out with great force and intelligence on the critical importance of human rights. In a column printed in the Washington Post of January 23, and the San Francisco Chronicle of January 26, she argues that "Human rights violations have created more dead, more homeless, more human misery than all the weapons of mass destruction."

Furthermore, she emphasizes the important point that human rights is not just a secondary consideration in our foreign policy. Human rights is the most important element in our international relations. As Ambassador Kirkpatrick explains, "Where people enjoy the right to criticize their government, to form associations and to emigrate, governments become responsive to their citizens. Democracies do not start aggressive wars."

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to give thought to this most thoughtful article by my good friend Jeane Kirkpatrick.

ABOVE ALL, HUMAN RIGHTS

(By Jeane Kirkpatrick)

If the promises are kept and the commitments honored, the East-West Accord on Human Rights signed in Vienna this week by the United States, Canada and all European countries except Albania will prove far more important that the INF and START treaties combined.

After all, INF and START reduce only the numbers of certain kinds of nuclear weapons. In this violent century, more millions of people have died at the hands of their own governments than in war.

The lack of great marches and the absence of international campaigns make it easy to miss or to forget that the greatest mass murders have been conducted by governments against their own unarmed populations; in the man-made famine of the Ukraine, in Stalin's gulag, in the Holocaust, in Pol Pot's murderous "utopia," in China's Cultural Revolution, in Ethiopia's "villagification" program. Additional thousands more have been slaughtered by Uganda's Idi Amin, by the Syrians at Hama, by the Ayatollah Khomeini, by the Argentine generals in the "dirty war."

Human rights violations have created more dead, more homeless, more human misery than all the weapons of mass destruction.

Moreover, as Andrei Sakharov has emphasized, the relationship between human rights, democracy and war is integral and crucial. Where people enjoy the right to criticize their government, to form associations and to emigrate, governments become responsive to the citizens. Democracies do not start aggressive wars.

Still, the impression persists that weapons of mass destruction—nuclear, chemical, biological—are more threatening than repressions. As a result, more excitement is generated by an agreement between two powers to eliminate only one category of weapons than by the solemn promise of 35 to permit free speech, press, association and emigration.

Of course the Vienna agreement—like the INF treaty—may be violated. Indeed, Czech policy used force to put down a peaceable demonstration before the ink was dry on Czechoslovakia's pledge to permit free association. Soviet and Eastern European governments repeatedly violated the promises contained in the Helsinki Final Act, then arrested Helsinki monitors for commenting on the violations.

It can be argued that promises solemnly repeated and systematically violated breed cynicism rather than progress. Nevertheless, it is potentially important that the Soviet Union has agreed in principle to honor political and civil rights in these accords.

Communist governments are not the only one that violate human rights in the modern world, but today the most systematic, pervasive denial of free speech, press, association, emigration and due process are found in Eastern Europe, Cuba, Nicaragua, Vietnam, Afghanistan, Mozambique, Ethiopia and other members of the "world socialist system."

Individual freedom has never been conceived as part of "the revolution" carried out in the name of Marx, Lenin and the socialist fatherland. Until recently the Soviet Union has persistently rejected the very idea that citizens could have rights against their governments.

When the United Nations in its early years drafted the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, Soviet delegate V.T. Tepliaiov sought to delete as unnecessary and undesirable most of the rights found in the French, American and British constitutions. These rights, he argued, might be appropriate enough for a capitalist state, but were inappropriate in social states—where the division between the individual and society had been overcome.

At that time, Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Andrei Y. Vishinsky put it this way: "The rights of human beings cannot be considered outside the pregrogative of governments. The very understanding of human rights is a government concept."

This approach did not die easily. In this early meetings with Ronald Reagan, Mikhail Gorbachev aggressively sought to avoid any discussion of human fights, and in these conversations (as in his book, "Perestroika") Gorbachev expressed disdain for Western conceptions of civil and political liberty.

Soviet "democracy" is not the same as that of the West, he said. Soviet rights are not the same, they are superior. The very existence of socialism guarantees the rights of citizens, he argued.

"In the U.S.S.R. freedom of speech and the press are primarily guranteed by the fact that the media all belong to the people and are not owned by private individuals or companies," said Gorbachev, ignoring the undoubted fact that state ownership of media gurantees the expression of only official opinions.

The Soviet Union's new endrosement of political and civil liberties is potentially important because each new affirmation makes repression more embarrasing, harder to defend. Each conference that focuses on these commitments can become a demonstration that tyranny is even more dangerous than war, and becomes an opportunity to remind the world that; as Father Morrison of Guyana wrote, "No country is so poor it cannot afford freedom or expression."

NEW ENGLAND ELECTRIC, CONSERVATION LAW FOUNDATION UNVEIL CONSERVATION INITIATIVE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, increasingly both public officials and private citizens have become aware of the grave environmental dangers posed by the greenhouse effect, and consequently of the even greater need than we have previously had to employ the best possible methods of conservation in our use of energy. For that reason, I was particularly pleased to read the recent announcement by the New England Electric System about an impressive program to promote conservation which NEES developed with the Conservation Law Foundation of New England. The leaders of both organizations are entitled to congratulations for their innovative and impressive approach. For working together so well, for advancing the important goal of conservation in a way that will promote economic development, and for their commitment to even further improvements, they deserve not only praise, but emulation. I earnestly hope that our utility companies elsewhere in the country will follow the model of the NEES in this important area. And I hope that they will be fortunate enough to have an organization as skillful and responsible as the Conservation Law Foundation to work with if they do that.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the announcement by the New England Electric System and the Conservation Law Foundation of this very important initiative be printed here, so that others may not only learn of it, but be encouraged by it.

NEW ENGLAND ELECTRIC, CONSERVATION LAW FOUNDATION UNVEIL CONSERVATION INITIATIVE

New England's second largest utility and a leading environmental group today announced several new aggressive energy efficiency programs to reduce electric power demand in the region. Under the programs, offered by New England Electric System (NEES) companies, and developed in cooperation with the Conservation Law Foundation of New England (CLF), the utility will provide technical assistance and energy efficient hardware to increase energy efficiency in new construction projects as well as in existing homes, businesses and factories.

"New England Electric has been actively addressing conservation and load management since 1976. In the past two years, we took a major step forward with our 'Partners in Energy Planning' program, a comprehensive five year program of conservation and load management. As part of that effort, we invited the Conservation Law Foundation, a leading regional advocate of conservation, to review our conservation and load management programs and help us evaluate and develop new programs," said Joan T. Bok, chairman and chief executive officer of New England Electric System.

"Under these programs, NEES will be going beyond traditional utility conservation efforts," noted Douglas Foy, CLF executive director. "The NEES companies will be providing engineering design services and paying for energy efficiency—just like they pay for a power plant. NEES's proposed level of hands-on direct investment in conservation is unprecedented and should be a model for utilities nationwide."

Today's announcement is the result of a unique six month cooperative effort between New England Electric and the Conservation Law Foundation. Under the new and enhanced programs announced today, NEES will Support and help plan energy efficient features in up to half of all new commercial buildings and industrial facilities built in its service territory over the next decade, resulting in energy savings per building of at least 20 percent above the levels required by the Massachusetts building code; a similar program for electrically heated homes is under development.

Implement the demonstration phase of a program for its residential customers who have limited or fixed incomes. The program, initially in a targeted geographic area for 5,000 residential customers who fall within 175 percent of federal poverty guidelines, will involve the direct installation of energy efficient products and services.

Help educate large businesses and industries about comprehensive energy accounting and management procedures, and pay for replacements of building and plant lighting, motors, air conditioners, etc. with high efficiency models.

"The success of our conservation and load management effort to date can be seen in our results. Within two years, we have achieved reductions and contracts for the near future that represent 56 percent of our goal to reduce peak demand for electricity by 230,000 kilowatts by 1991. While we are spending a considerable amount of money on conservation and load management programs, the cost is less or comparable to traditional supply based alternatives," Bok said. "Additionally, as a result of our cooperative effort with the CLF, we are increasing our conservation and load management program's goal to reduce peak demand by at least 300,000 kilowatts by 1991. By the year 2007 we expect that our conservation and load management efforts will reduce peak demand by 938,000 kilowatts, which is the equivalent of 1,172,000 kilowatts of generation capacity."

"Beyond these significant kilowatt savings, conservation and load management are part of a sound environmental policy," said Bok. "Our concern for the environment has been an integral part of our conservation and load management planning."

New England Electric System is a public utility holding company headquartered in Westborough, Mass. Retail subsidiaries include: Massachusetts Electric Company, The Narragansett Electric Company in Rhode Island, and Granite State Electric Company in New Hampsire. It also has a wholesale generating subsidiary, New England Power Company.

The Conservation Law Foundation is the New England region's leading nonprofit environmental law organization.

TRIBUTE TO THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF NEWTON FALLS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the First Congregational Church of Newton Falls (OH), in recognition of the church's 185th anniversary. It is with great pleasure that I stand today to honor the church in their celebration.

Only 28 years after the battle for independence, and 1½ years after Ohio had obtained statehood, the Reverend Joseph Badger traveled to the Connecticut Western Reserve. On September 12, 1804, he gathered a group of settlers to celebrate the first service of Holy Communion in the area, calling his gathered church The Church of Jesus Christ of Newton. Today, led by the Reverend Garred W. Johnston, the First Congregational Church of Newton Falls carries on the fine tradition of worship started by Reverend Badger 185 years ago.

I ask that the House join me today in honoring the First Congregational Church of Newton Falls. May they continue to serve the spiritual and cultural needs of their community with the same zeal and dedication as they have shown in the last 185 years. Let us extend to them our heartiest congratulations on their anniversary and wish them the best of luck in the future.

A FRAMEWORK FOR EXTENDING CREDIT TO THE SOVIET UNION

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, during the last Congress, my subcommittee, the Banking Subcommittee on International Finance, Trade, and Monetary Policy held a hearing on extending credit to the Soviet Union. Subsequently, I introduced legislation that provided a framework for the United States and its allies, as to how credit could be offered to the Soviets without having it undermine the Western alliance.

Bill Danvers, the staff director of my subcommittee, wrote an article for the Journal of Commerce on this subject that discussed this legislation. I am submitting Bill's article for the RECORD.

[From the Journal of Commerce, Dec. 22, 1988]

AN EAST-WEST ECONOMIC AGENDA

(By William C. Danvers)

During the past several weeks European financial institutions are reported to have provided the Soviet Union with access to nearly $9 billion worth of credit.

In order to ensure that Western security, human rights and economic concerns are not undermined by this dramatic upsurge in lending to the Soviets, the United States must enter into discussions with our allies that will lead to a complete accounting of the extent of these financial transactions with the Soviets, as well as lay the groundwork for a common allied strategy regarding economic relations with the Soviet Union.

Legislation outlining the framework for such a policy was introduced during the last Congress. The bill would require an annual report to Congress from the U.S. Department of the Treasury on the extent of all Western and Japanese financial dealings with the Soviets.

At the same time, it would require the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into negotiations with other members of the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development to establish, if necessary, guidelines for lending to the Soviets, or at the very least, to set up a more exact system of accounting for these transactions.

Since U.S. banks hold less than 2% of all Western loans to the Soviets, a coordinated effort on the part of Western nations and Japan is crucial to get a full picture of the extent of Soviet access to hard currency or Western capital.

While official U.S. policy states that as long as all credit extended to the Soviets is not subsidized it is acceptable, the real question about such lending is whether or not it runs counter to allied interests.

The factual basis for the question was presented by General Coline Powell, the head of the National Security Council, in a speech Nov. 8. Gen. Powell noted that the recent increase in availability of Western capital for the Soviet Union involved lines of credit, not loans, and that they do not violate agreements among the allies.

"It does not appear," the general observed, "that these relatively small amounts of borrowing tied to the purchase of Western consumer goods will have any discernible effect on Soviet military preparedness or on the security of the West."

The real policy question facing the United States and its allies, then, lies in whether or not the credit is used to promote internal reforms in the Soviet Union that will reinforce Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's stated desire to move away from military spending toward a policy more oriented to the consumer and the building of nonmilitary infrastructure.

There are clear benefits to helping Mr. Gorbachev implement such a policy. A more open Soviet economy would enhance East-West trade, providing an additional market for Western goods and services.

Increased emphasis on the purchase of consumer goods could lead to reduced Soviet defense expenditures and, in turn, greater potential for improved relations between NATO and the Warsaw Pact.

In addition, improved economic and security relations could encourage further progress in Soviet Union rights policies, including increased emigration rights for Soviet Jews. Certainly in the past when superpower tensions have eased under the umbrella of successful arms control and regional security negotiations, there have been observable improvements in Soviet human rights policy.

It follows, then, that under present circumstances there are potential benefits to be derived from extending credit to the Soviet Union for the development of consumer goods. It is important, however, that this credit be used to upgrade the quality and quantity of consumer goods in the Soviet Union and not as a means to prop up an ineffective agricultural system and consumer industries.

The effective allocation of credit to the Soviet Union must, therefore, be coupled with internal economic reforms. This, in turn, underlines the need for a more informed knowledge of Soviet creditworthiness.

Tests of creditworthiness must include more information on how the Soviets are using imports obtained on credit, the likely success of consumer-related reforms and progress from the point of view of an integrated import and restructuring strategy.

While there has been a divergence of opinion between the United States and Western allies on the issue of credits to the Soviet Union, it is most important to remember that Western nations have a common interest in security, human rights, and economic concerns.

Arms control, nuclear and conventional, has always been the central issue of concern in East-West relations. It is time for economic relations to assume a position of similar importance.

Just as arms control discussions among the United States and Europe have moved from a broader approach to a more direct discussion of defense allocation and verification, so too Western economic relations with the Soviets must move toward a more coordinated approach among Western nations with an emphasis on the verification and transparency of the extention of credits to the restructuring of the Soviet civilian economy.

There is a need to get more information on Western financial dealings with the Soviet Union as well as to use the information for informed, coordinated policies related to creditworthiness and security.

The best legislative alternative is to emphasize the disclosure of East-West financial transactions within the framework of inter-allied cooperation, thereby offering a middle ground on this issue that reflects the approach that President Reagan has adopted concerning arms control: trust but verify.

THE CASE OF CHICO MENDES

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the case of Chico Mendes who was murdered December 22, 1988, in the village of Xapuri in the Amazon region of Brazil. Chico Mendes was a seringueiro, a rubber tapper who fought against the ongoing destruction of the Amazonian rain forest by cattle ranchers, landowners, and international developers.

He was one of the first people to organize resistance against the large scale destruction of the single most important forest area in the world. As the leader of the "extractive reserves" movement he worked to set aside reserves throughout the Amazon to save parts of the rain forest from destruction through cattle ranching and development. He died because he posed a threat to a group of people apparently oblivious to the prospects of a major ecological disaster in years to come.

Unfortunately, the case of Chico Mendes is not an isolated incident. All over the world, courageous people who stand up against the destruction of their base of living, and our ecosystem as a whole, get intimidated, arrested, and even killed.

I urge the Brazilian Government, and governments throughout the world, to protect those who work for the preservation of undeveloped land. It is not only a matter of human rights but also a matter of enormous ecological importance.

LET'S ELIMINATE THE APPEARANCE OF IMPROPRIETY BY BANNING THE ACCEPTANCE OF HONORARIA

HON. JOSEPH E. BRENNAN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, legislation I am introducing today will eliminate a practice which has increasingly cast an unfavorable light on the Congress—the practice of accepting up to $2,000 in speaking or appearance fees.

These fees or gifts have become widespread among the various interest groups and our constituents are growing tired of the shadow cast on Congress by this practice. I am one Member of Congress who has chosen not to accept honoraria. While I in no way question the integrity of any Members of Congress who now accept honoraria, the practice should clearly be abolished to avoid impropriety, or even the appearance of impropriety.

As holders of the public trust, we must continue to go to great lengths to avoid conflicts of interest. These speaking fees or gifts are not given to us because of our great oratorical flair or significant insights into complex public issues, instead they have become an accepted and widely practiced means to curry favor and attempt to gain influence, or at least access, to Members. In recent years we see that prepared remarks are no longer needed to pocket the fees, Members only need to show up at an event, in some cases, and make their presence known.

In our positions, we will always be lobbied by groups with an interest in legislation before Congress. But offering and accepting money, which the Member of Congress can use in any way he or she likes, adds an unsavory dimension to the practice of lobbying and being lobbied.

The elimination of honoraria fees will restore a form of equity to the Congress, in which all Members will receive the same Government-approved salary, without these supplemental fees from outside groups. And most importantly, by banning honoraria, we can remove a shadow which is cast upon Congress at a time when the ethical behavior of Government officials is increasingly viewed with a skeptical eye.

I urge my colleagues to join me in eliminating an ethically questionable practice by cosponsoring my legislation to ban the acceptance of honoraria.

THOUGHTS ON THE PAY RAISE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, as expected, the President's recommendation to increase the salaries of Members of Congress and other Government officials has raised a storm of controversy. I was particularly impressed by Mike Royko's comments on this issue and I am happy to recommend his recent column to my colleagues.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Dec. 13, 1988]

CONGRESS PAY ISN'T A BALLPARK FIGURE

(By Mike Royko)

The most popular position to take on pay raises for congressmen is that we shouldn't give these political scoundrels one extra nickel.

As Patrick Buchanan, the conservative columnist, angrily put it while ranting about "Beltway Bandits":

"Currently, members of Congress receive $89,500 a year, five times what the average American earns."

That's an interesting statistic, but I'm not sure what it means.

I'm certain that Buchanan, with his speaking fees and TV shows, rakes in 30 or 40 times what the average American earns. He probably makes at least five or six times what the average congressman is paid.

Does that mean that Patrick Buchanan is a more valuable creature than 30 or 40 average Americans? Or five or six congressmen?

Possibly, although as fierce as Buchanan is, I wouldn't swap a good watchdog for him, and all a good dog costs is the price of table scraps.

Actually, I don't have any strong feelings against congressmen getting pay raises. I've known some congressmen who weren't worth $8.95 a year. Others would be a bargain at $895,000 a year. So maybe it balances out.

That's the problem with trying to decide who's worth how much.

In Chicago, a garbage collector makes about $25,000 a year, and a cop about $33,000.

Compare that to Sylvester Stallone, who took in $63 million over the last two years without emptying one smelly can or firing anything but blanks.

Is Stallone worth 910 cops and 1,240 garbage collectors? Or even one cop and one garbage collector?

Without garbage collectors and cops, we'd have disease and anarchy. Without Sylvester Stallone? Well, we'd still have Arnold Schwarzenegger, who made only $43 million in 1987-88.

Or consider Goose Gossage, who pitches for the Cubs. His employers paid him $1,235,000 for last summer's work. All Gossage did for that money was make Chicagoans unhappy.

It happens that I work for the same corporation that owns the Cubs. They paid me much less than they paid Gossage, although I probably made just as many Chicagoans unhappy as he did. For that matter, I've been making them unhappy since Gossage was a mere tyke.

But do I resent being paid less than Gossage? Of course not. That's because Gossage earned about 15 times as much as Dan Quayle, which seems fair.

That's the trouble with juggling numbers, as Pat Buchanan did with his "five times what the average American earns."

The fact is, the average congressman is not the average American. He is better educated, smarter, reads more, watches fewer game shows and soap operas on TV, knows more about law, foreign affairs, national problems and assumes greater responsibilities. So why shouldn't a congressman be paid as much as a weak-hitting utility infielder?

In the big federal spending picture, a raise for congressmen is just pocket change. The Pentagon will spend more than the entire congressional raise on a few airplanes that don't fly.

Yet, the average person becomes outraged at the thought of a public official—any public official—wanting a pay hike.

We demand good judges, yet we pay them less than they could earn chasing an ambulance. We want good governors to manage our states, but become indignant if they ask to be paid more than the manager of a small factory.

Isn't it kind of goofy that the president of the United States—the most powerful man in the world when he's awake—is paid less than a mediocre point guard in the National Basketball Association? Or a network anchorman? Or some local disc jockeys?

Or consider that Elvis Presley made about $15 million this year. That's not bad for someone who has been dead for 11 years.

That's the salary of 180 congressmen. Or 45 United States presidents. Although I'm not a big fan of George Bush, I hope that he will contribute more to this nation during the next four years than a deceased rock singer.

The key to the public pocketbook seems to be entertainment. Americans don't mind spending a collective fortune on anything that will amuse or divert them. That's why athletes and other entertainers become vastly wealthy. Michael Jackson, Bill Cosby, Bruce Springsteen, Madonna, they're all in the $20 million to $50 million a year range. Some golfer recently picked up more than a million in a weekend.

But we bang the table at the thought of a congressman making what any of the entertainers pay for a car.

Congress ought to wise up. Instead of going on C-Span and holding debates, they ought to learn to dance, sing and slam-dunk a ball.

AMERICANISM CONTEST WINNERS

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, again this year, I would like to draw your attention to the following three essays composed by several young Ohioans who expressed their views on what the word "Americanism" means to them. These three individuals are the winners of an annual contest that is sponsored by the Americanism Foundation of Norwalk, OH, in my own 13th District.

WHAT AMERICANISM MEANS TO ME

(By Mark Metzger)

What is Americanism? Is it God? No. Is it our culture? Perhaps. Is it freedom? Maybe.

Is it baseball and a cold, Sunday beer? Probably not. Well, you say, these are American things. Why who could be an American and not like baseball? Americanism is a unique, truely American, combination of all these things—and many more. What it means to me and how it influences our lives is the subject of the following essay.

Americanism is only half of the true United States. In the following paragraphs, let us compare Americanism and the other half, which we shall call America.

Americanism has a cousin called America. They are related, but each is represented by different aspects of American life. Well, then, what is America? America is the outer, busy surface of the United States. America is segregation. It is the homeless. It is the prostitutes, the druggies, the bums. It is the small-scale farmer trying to maintain a way of life. It is the pain, the tears, the anguish. It is the inner workings of our government. It is crime, and war, and hate. It can be the United States' dark side. It is the United States' overalls.

America stands for the good things as well. America is our government's policies. It is our technology and expansion. It is our demand for knowledge and our urge to conquer outer space. America stands for development and prosperity.

Americanism is the United States' slower moving, inner surface. It is formed around small groups or individuals. Americanism is teamwork. It is Autumn, Winter, Summer, and Spring. It is the family farm. It is Mardis Gras. It is watermelon and the Fourth of July. It is a beautiful sunrise or a magnificent sunset. It is an evening drive in the country. It is the Rocky Mountains and the plains. Americanism is fields of swaying wheat, a national park, or the Redwood forests. Americanism is also Manhattan's skyline. It is the bustle of New York and Los Angeles. It is Jazz. It is homemade appple pie. It is the American Dream.

Americanism can be found in an American's inner feelings. Americanism is the pride in one's own accomplishments. It is the enjoyment of having put in a good day's work. It is patriotism and pride. Americanism is the feeling of independence; the knowledge of good and bad. Americanism is the closeness of families and a respect for religious freedom. It is the feeling of America. It is America's tuxedo.

Americanism is the one we brag about. We put it in our travel magazines and feature articles. We store it in books and museums. We tell the world: "We're home."

These two comparsions are purely black and white, but I believe they give an overall picture of what the United States is and the differences between Americanism and our outer surface, America. Both are descriptions of our culture, but Americanism goes deeper; into the heart of our country.

Americanism affects our daily lives with great but sometimes unnoticeable force. It gives a luster to America and gives us something to be proud of. You experience it everywhere. In the city or the country; driving home from work; taking a vacation. Whether you're alone or with a group, you are bound to see it and be affected by it. Your local park is a great place to feel it. You see families having fun; taking a picnic on the grass, hiking, or laughing over a good game of baseball. You also feel the peace and solemn beauty of nature.

Americanism is based on the family. Without the structural unit of the family, a major component of the feeling would be lost. The family symbolizes togetherness and teamwork. It stands for peace and brotherhood. These are the basics of Americanism, or Canadanism, or almost any other country's culture in the world. Communism, however, does not center around the family, but rather around the state and the government. This is the single, most leading cause of the tension between the United States and the Soviet Union.

We couldn't have true Americanism without the principles of freedom, either. Freedom and the family combine for better growth and development. Americanism stands for creativity and individuality, both of which, are brought about through freedom.

Americanism, then, is the important and beautiful things we feel, or build, or marvel at. Americanism deals not only with the United States, but reaches out to all the nations of the world, symbolizing freedom and security. Americanism cannot be attained, for we already have it. It needs only to be developed, and is extended and nourished by every infant born in this nation.

WHAT AMERICANISM MEANS TO ME

(By Jayme L. Mathias)

Now, for the first time in my life, I am reflecting on something that I have never thought about before—what Americanism really means to me.

Americanism is really hard for me to describe. I think that it is a feeling, a responsibility, that we have that makes us aware of the problems we face in our society today. Americanism is what compels us to do what is right, to help others in our daily lives, and to make our lives of value to ourselves and those around us.

Mere words cannot fully describe the meaning of Americanism in my life. I have always seen Americanism as actions, not words.

Perhaps many in our society view Americanism as the actions of heroes who gave up everything they had and sacrificed their lives in service to our country.

I view Americanism differently. I don't see Americanism through wartime heroes as often as I see it displayed by those heroes living in our own day and age. The ones in our lives who escape our attention, but will always be there, remembered by their acts of courage and caring.

To those, the silent heroes, I dedicate this essay, for they are living symbols of what Americanism really is.

Americanism is shown in so many different ways in our daily lives and the lives of those around us, and yet so many times it goes unnoticed or ignored by many of us.

One person, an old, full-blooded American Indian, that I met once is the most outstanding memory that I have of a person who really demonstrated Americanism. Iron Eyes Cody, the Indian Chief on "Ernest Goes to Camp" dedicated his life toward the preservation of America's natural resources. Iron Eyes strived for years to hold onto his tribe's culture and its customs. He also started many services like the "Keep America Beautiful" and the "Hometown U.S.A." programs to preserve America's beauty for future generations. He sets an example in his daily life for everyone to follow.

Another silent hero, Fr. Bruce Ritter, has dedicated his life toward helping the homeless or troubled teenagers of New York City. Fr. Ritter rounded up enough support to start the Convenant House, a place for these unoriented teens to live and learn. By getting these kids off the streets, educating them, and teaching them responsibility; this great man has saved and redirected countless lives from falling into corrupt, evil ways.

These men are only a few of the many heroes in our society who dedicate themselves to God, their country, or others.

Without these living legends, the dream of Americanism would soon burn out.

We can all become heroes but first we must strive to set a good example and give more to others in our country than they have given to us.

WHAT AMERICANISM MEANS TO ME

(By Robert Crawford)

To the unsaved people in the world, Americanism merely means freedom to have fun and do as you please a long as it satisfies you. They act wild and party in the name of patriotism, when it's just an excuse to do wrong and claim it as your freedom and your right. Probably the most well known phrase that symbolizes the world's ungodly phylosophy is "If it feels good, do it."

This great country was once founded upon the principles of God and led by great men of God, such as George Washington, John Locke, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Jefferson, and the list goes on and on. America was founded for the sole principle of having the freedom to live christian lives, pleasing to God and worshipping God as we please. This is Americanism, loving God's chosen country because it gives us the freedom to do right not wrong.

It is no coincidence that the greatest nation in the world was founded on God's infallible book—The Bible. Why, we even state this on our currency with the well known phrase, "In God We Trust".

In the book of Genesis, chapter twelve, verses two and three, we find the account of God telling Abraham to make a nation. God said that He would bless those who bless it and curse those who curse it. That is the way that America is. God placed his hand of blessing on it from the start, only now we have turned away from God, causing him to bring judgment of us. America is heading for a fall unless we turn back to God.

I attend a Christian school and go to church three times a week. I worship God as I want and do as I want. Where else can you do this but in America? What does Americanism mean to me, freedom to do what God has instructed me to do and not being ashamed to do it.

THE 60TH BIRTHDAY OF BARBI WEINBERG

HON. HENRY A WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is our profound honor to call to your attention and the attention of our esteemed colleagues a signal event both for our community and for an individual of particular distinction: The 60th birthday of Barbi Weinberg.

Barbi Weinberg is indisputably one of the most involved, dedicated, persistent, and effective leaders in our Nation. Mrs. Weinberg has had a major impact not only on her local community but on the affairs of the State of California, our Nation, and, indeed, in the international arena.

One of the areas which has most concerned Barbi Weinberg and her husband, Lawrence, has been peace in the Middle East. The Weinbergs have labored tirelessly for an end to the conflict which has plagued that region for 40 years. Barbi Weinberg has seen a strong and secure Israel as the keystone to peace and stability in the Middle East.

Mrs. Weinberg is the president of the important research establishment, the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. Mrs. Weinberg has long been active in the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee [AIPAC]. She currently serves on AIPAC's executive committee and is a former vice president of this respected American voice for understanding of Israel's problems and promoting the close relationship between the United States and Israel, based on shared values and interests.

In the Los Angeles Jewish community, Larry and Barbi Weinberg have given their time and talents to virtually every worthy group. Barbi Weinberg is a past president of the Jewish Federation Council of Greater Los Angeles. Barbi was the first woman to head this umbrella organization which encompasses scores of agencies and organizations serving more than 600,000 Jews in southern California.

While Barbi Weinberg has been preoccupied with Middle East affairs and the responsibilities of local Jewish leadership, she has also made an impact in other areas. In 1984, she served on the board of the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee. She has also been active in local and statewide democratic party activities.

Barbi and Larry Weinberg are the proud parents of two sons and two daughters—Jeff and his wife Susan, Jim, Jan and her husband Phil Zakowski, and Julie and her husband Rand Fishbein. The Weinberg family now counts seven grandchildren with reliable predictions of additions in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, each of us has had the delightful experience of working with Barbi Weinberg on projects of mutual concern. Each of us has benefited much from her keen intelligence, wise sense of tactics, and, above all, resoluteness. Barbi and Larry Weinberg epitomize the active, involved citizen Alexis De Tocqueville saw at the very heart of American democracy.

We ask every Member of this House to join us in saluting Barbi Weinberg on the auspicious occasion of her 60th birthday. We further ask that the House extend to Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Weinberg its sincere expression of appreciation for their civic contributions and its best wishes to the entire Weinberg family for good health and continued spirited involvement in public affairs.

CHARLES STUZIN: KEEPING ON TOP BY LOOKING AHEAD

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, Dade County is well known for the rapid change which has affected our area over the past three decades. This has been the cause for the demise of many businesses that were not about to adapt to changing conditions.

To find a business in our area that was handed down from father to son that not only has adapted to change, but uses it as a positive force for growth and innovation, is rare indeed. But this is exactly the case with Citizens Federal Bank under the enlightened direction of David Stuzin and, today, his son Charles.

I have known this family for many years. I can well recall when Dave Stuzin started Citizens Federal Savings & Loan in Hialeah, and I have seen Charlie learn from his father and grow into an important force in south Florida banking.

This month, Florida Trend magazine profiles Charles Stuzin, and I would like to share this article with my colleagues. I hope it might add a little different perspective on the current savings and loan crisis.

CITIZENS FEDERAL GETS THE LAST LAUGH

(By Phillip Longman)

"Before long," Charles Stuzin says his father told him in 1967, "there will come a day of reckoning."

David Stuzin had just returned from England, where he had made a discovery that shook his faith in the future. As founder and head of Citizens Federal Savings and Loan Association of Miami—now Citizens Federal Bank—he had turned a tidy profit for 15 years and thought he understood his business. He merely did just what every other thrift executive in the United States had done, at government insistence, for more than a generation: take in short-term deposits and use the money to write fixed-rate home mortgages for as long as 30 years.

But while in England, David Stuzin learned that his counterparts abroad thought he was nuts, and indeed, that the United States was the only country in the world where thrifts engaged in such risky practice. "What if inflation and interest rates rose substantially in the 1970s?" Stuzin was asked by the British thrift executives he met. Deposits are the raw materials of a thrift industry, they said, while mortgages are the finished product. By offering fixed rate mortgages, Stuzin and the U.S. thrift industry as a whole were operating like a manufacturing company that guarantees prices for up to 30 years while having no idea what the cost of its raw materials will be in the meantime.

Stuzin had never looked at his business this way before, and when he returned home he took immediate action. Making use of an obscure, temporary loophole in the law then governing the nation's S&Ls, Stuzin started doing what none of his competitors would try for more than a decade: writing adjustable rate mortgages that freed the thrift of risk of future inflation. As interest rates rose in the late 1960s, Citizens found a ready market for its newfangled product. All went well until Congress found out what the thrift was up to and quickly voted to close the loophole at the insistence of more traditional S&Ls.

Since then, Citizens has come to be known as the thrift that always zigs when others zag. David Stuzin died in 1982, but his son Charles continues in his iconoclastic tradition, sometimes inviting the ridicule of other thrift executives, but almost always laughing last. "Citizens is a horse of another color," says Paula S. Johannsen, an analyst with Williams Securities in Tampa. Yet despite, or more accurately, because of its eccentricity, Citizens has been consistently profitable. "In the hardest of times for the S&L industry, these guys have never lost money," says Tim Rayl of Gulfstream Financial, one of the few analysts left in Florida who bothers to follow the ailing industry closely these days.

Citizens earned $11.4 million last year. Through November, its earnings are up 15%. With $3.5 billion in assets, and a regulatory net worth of 8.5%, Citizens is among the fastest growing and most solvent of Florida's thrifts.

"I never follow what other companies are doing," Stuzin says today. A prime example of the soundness of that business philosophy—at least as applied to the U.S. thrift industry—came at the beginning of this decade. Having pioneered adjustable rate mortgages in the late 1960s, Citizens prospered in the early 1980s by avoiding them, just as ARMs were becoming all the rage.

"It was the only strategy to go with if you used common sense," Stuzin recalls, before hastening to assert his respect for his less-fortunate competitors. Like other thrifts, Citizens Savings was being punished severely by the rapid rise in interest rates, just as his father had predicted. But having been prevented by government regulation from offering ARMs at the beginning of the great inflationary bubble of the 1970s, the Stuzins saw no sense in offering them now. If rates stayed high, they reasoned, Citizens would go down the tubes, regardless. And no matter what happened to interest rates, adjustable rate mortgages would never earn enough to cover Citizens' underperforming assets from the past. So the Stuzins loaded up with as many 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages as they could write and prayed rates would decline. They did, and Citizens blasted on to easy street. By April 1983, Citizens' stock was selling for $51 a share—after a two-for-one split—up from $8 to $10 a share they are getting on their savings.

In 1986, Stuzin realized that out-of-state banks had already grabbed 10% of all Florida deposits. "I thought to myself, 'They're taking our share of the pie. We can't compete if they have the initiative. We have to play their game.'" Yet even those who could follow Stuzin's logic this far were astounded by his next move. In July 1986, Citizens bought a small, insolvent thrift called Equitable Federal Savings based outside of Columbus, Ohio—a state not only beset by industrial decline, but recently traumatized by the collapse of most of its state-chartered thrifts after the ESM Government Securities scandal. Stuzin says that no sooner had he announced the deal than a Wall Street Journal reporter called to question his sanity; Florida Trend and other Florida publications also criticized his judgment. But two years later, Stuzin has turned Equitable around, just as the Midwest is at last rebounding.

Meanwhile, Stuzin also has picked up the deposits and offices of two other insolvent thrifts: Centennial Savings and Loan of Guerneville, California, outside San Francisco, and Ultimate Savings Bank of Richmond, Virginia. The Centennial deal will give Citizens the right to branch throughout California. By acquiring Ultimate, Citizens has entered one of the strongest, yet little-noticed markets in the country. "I personally can think of no better place for a Miami thrift to come," says John McCartney, director of Institutional Sales for Branch, Cabell & Co., a Richmond brokerage firm. Though Citizens does not report its out-of-state operations separately, Stuzin says all three institutions have become profitable, in part because Stuzin acquired only their deposits and not their bad loans.

What is Citizens' next move? Stuzin says he's open to buying more bankrupt thrifts up North if the price and the place are right. He also plans to continue attracting capital by issuing medium- and long-term debt securities and by leveraging his growing portfolio of mortgage-backed securities. The only option not open to him, Stuzin says, is selling more stock in the company, so long as the performance of the rest of the thrift industry continues to scare off investors and depress prices. For now, Citizens remains closely held by the Stuzin family, who continue to make money their own way.

EMERGENCIES IN THE AIR

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, 28 colleagues have joined me as original cosponsors of the In-Flight Emergency Medical Assistance Act. Late in the 100th Congress I introduced this bill which would permit licensed physicians the freedom to act in a genuine emergency.

When a heart attack or similar life-threatening emergency takes place while the victim is traveling in the air, very special circumstances apply. On flights of long duration it can often be hours before a victim is transported to a hospital or medical facility. Most commercial flights will have an average two or three medical doctors among the list of passengers, unfortunately standard malpractice laws still apply to any treatment rendered by a doctor. This bill, which the American Medical Association has fully endorsed, would free licensed physicians from constraining malpractice liability when treating an in-flight emergency.

Fear of a malpractice lawsuit could prevent a well-qualified professional from giving the kind of assistance that saves lives. The In-Flight Emergency Medical Assistance Act will not tolerate grossly irresponsible actions: It will give doctors needed freedom to act to the best of their abilities.

During the 99th Congress legislation was introduced which resulted in the inclusion of a comprehensive medical kit on commercial flights. However, any physician who uses this kit in an emergency situation risks full malpractice liability.

Mr. Speaker, I urge prompt consideration of this worthy bill. It is unfortunate that a physican's Hippocratic oath has too often run up against a wall of tort laws. Let's not wait for a needless tragedy to stir Congress to action.

IN COMMEMORATION OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the Ukraine and the aspirations of its people on the 71st anniversary of the Ukraine's short-lived independence.

Because of its strategic geographical position and rich resources, the Ukraine has always been viewed as a coveted prize of aggressors from the Mongols to the Tzars, and more recently the Soviet Communists.

In 1917, the Russian Autocratic government disintegrated and the Ukrainian National Republic proclaimed its independence from foreign domination and declared its existence. With this declaration, Ukrainians demonstrated to the world that Moscow cannot represent the ethnic heterogeneity that is the Soviet Union. Kiev represented the democratic concept of government based on respect for human rights and the dignity of man. Moscow represented totalitarianism and the g-dless force of destruction.

After the Ukrainian Declaration of Independence, the bloody Russian-Ukrainian War lasted for four terrible years. The Ukrainian freedom fighters were crushed by the Soviet Red Army. Since the Soviet occupation of that land, over 10 million Ukrainians have died in the defense of their country.

On the occasion of the 71st anniversary of Ukrainian independence, we pay special tribute to the brave men and women of the Ukraine who are carrying forward, at great personal danger and great personal sacrifice the struggle for independence and freedom. The spirit of the Ukrainian people is as strong today as it was in 1918.

Let me also pay special tribute to the millions of Ukrainian Americans who have done so much to make America the great nation it is today. They have toiled in the farms and fields, they have sweated in industry. Many have even made the ultimate sacrifice * * * the gift of their lives in the defense of liberty and democracy around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, although many years have passed since January 22, 1918, the flame of freedom burns stronger than ever before. With the human rights reforms currently being implemented by the Soviet leadership hope exists as never before that the final battle in the war between Athens and Sparta will be won, and the citizens of the Ukraine will once again hear the words of their own national anthem being sung.

CRASH OF AIR NATIONAL GUARD F-4 AIRPLANE

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, an antiquated Air National Guard F-4 crashed in rough seas off the coast of my district. Coast Guard Air Station Astoria, which has one of the Coast Guard's most challenging search and rescue assignments, received the distress call. Despite a valiant effort in heavy seas by a Coast Guard Swimmer Petty Officer Kelly Mogk and others, one of the two Guardsmen died in the crash.

Since the crash, many questions have been rasied concerning the equipment used by the Coast Guard. Some of the questions are mine—reliability of the HH-65, the much publicized failures of the Lycoming powerplant, the ability of the HH-65 to carry more than one swimmer, a crew, and rescue victims.

I intend to get answers to these questions. But what is beyond question is the bravery and expertise of the search and rescue crews. Part modern-day Rough Riders, part samaritans, part adventurer—all heart and guts.

As a further evidence of the courage and skill of our Coast Guard crews, I urge my colleagues to read the following account of another rescue, told by Dr. Richard Breemer of Newport, OR, who was a firsthand witness to the life saving rescue of two Oregon loggers.

DECEMBER 28, 1989.

Dear Congressman AuCoin: On Wednesday, the 21st of December, I was a witness to and participated in a very impressive rescue by Coast Guard helicopter of a logger from a ridge in East Lincoln County, and I am writing this letter so that this brave and skillful helicopter crew can get some of the credit that is due them. LinCom was called that morning and advised that two loggers had been injured on a job in East Lincoln County—one very seriously, who was unconscious from the time of injury.

Lincoln County Ambulance Unit Lincoln 3 and a Quick Response Team from East Lincoln County were both dispatched to this very remote site, Life Flight was called and the Coast Guard was notified. Life Flight, on arriving in the area, found the weather to be too foul for them and landed at the football field in Philomath. A Coast Guard helicopter, crewed by Capt. Mike Lovett, Commanding Officer of Group North Bend, with co-pilot Lieut. Pat Monarch and crew of Petty Officer First Class Jeff Hanson were in the air off the Coast at Newport and dispatched immediately to the site of the accident.

Upon arriving at the site, they found that the injured parties were a few hundred yards away from a landing where the helicopter could put down, but the terrain was very rough and it appeared the best bet for getting the badly-injured man out would be to lift him out with the helicopter. Capt. Lovett flew back to Newport to refuel to have enough fuel for lifting the patient out and getting him to a hospital, and while he was at Newport he asked Fire Chief Don Rowley to summon some EMTs to make the trip with him in case help could be rendered to the patient in the helicopter. When

Rowley put this call out, I was doing paper work at my desk and a helicopter ride sounded considerably more interesting than shuffling papers, so I responded to the airport and Dietmar Goebel, a Newport fireman and EMT, and I flew in the helicopter to the site of the accident.

It is overly generous to call the weather that day "rotten" as we flew in canyons with clouds on both sides of the canyons and the ground temperature at the landing site was 33 degrees. When Capt. Lovett landed the helicopter, Dietmar and I got out and walked down to the location of the injured loggers. The two injured men were being cared for by very capable paramedics from Lincoln Ambulance, headed by Gary DeHart, and from working with Gary in the past, I was comfortable that all of the proper pre-hospital treatment had been initiated and it was very obvious that the most important consideration at that point, some two to three hours after the injury, was to get the seriously-injured gentleman to a hospital, preferably one with a neurosurgeon on the staff.

I watched from the helicopter landing site while Capt. Lovett and his crew hovered the chopper over the site of the injured loggers, dropped a line and hoisted the party with the head injury up into the chopper. They then returned the chopper to the landing site and picked me up and we departed. About the only functional thing I did on the whole trip was recognize Highway 20 from the air, advise Capt. Lovett to turn right and follow this to Corvallis and then point out the hospital to Capt. Lovett when we arrived at Corvallis, since he knows the area of the Coast very well from the air but not the Valley.

The injured logger, a 33 year old gentleman from Corvallis named Ronald Fuller, was found to have not only a significant head injury when he arrived in Corvallis but to have a crushed kidney and significant inter-abdominal bleeding. While paramedic DeHart had appropriately started an IV in this gentleman prior to transportation, I don't think that Mr. Fuller would have survived the 2½ to 3 hours it would have taken to get him out by carrying him across very rugged terrain and then driving over very rough roads to Corvallis. In short, I feel that the evacuation by helicopter saved his life. Unfortunately, on the date of this letter (December 28) Mr. Fuller was still unconscious at Corvallis, but he is alive and I believe that Capt. Lovett and his crew get direct credit for that fact.

"What's the big deal?" someone might ask, "The Coast Guard helicopters pick people up out of the water all of the time and fly them to hospitals or to shore." The difference is the weather and terrain made the risk of this mission a whole different magnitude. Had the weather closed in the ends of any of the canyons we were flying in, there really wouldn't be anywhere to go, unless one was fortunate enough to be over some sort of a landing area, and I assure you there weren't very many of them around on the ground in that area. While the Coast Guard's very sophisticated helicopters are equipped for instrument fight, flying through clouds when the ground temperature is 33 degrees is terribly dangerous, as helicopters ice up just like fixed-wing aircraft do, only they tolerate icing even less well than fixed-wing aircraft.

Some were dubious as to the need for a helicopter station here in Newport with a station 100 miles south in North Bend and another 140 miles north in Astoria. Participation in this mission has certainly served as a convincer for me. The final argument regarding the value of the Coast Guard helicopters is in the answer to the following question—"Just how much is a human life worth?"

Sincerely,

RICHARD K. BEEMER, M.D.,
Newport, Oregon.

TRIBUTE TO L. STANLEY CRANE

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor L. Stanley Crane. Mr. Crane's career stands as an example to all of us of how the intelligence and perserverance of one man can be instrumental in orchestrating the success of a major company, and ensuring that that company makes a significant contribution back to the community.

Crane recently retired as chairman and chief executive officer of the Philadelphia-based Consolidated Rail Corporation. Conrail has established the L. Stanley Crane professorship of engineering at George Washington University, Crane's alma mater, in tribute to Crane's distinguished 51 year railroad industry career.

Crane guided Conrail from financial hardship into profitability in the early 1980's, when Conrail was still under Federal Government ownership. This was achieved partly by pursuading this body to alter legislation so the Conrail could cut down those operations that were not profitable. He then led the transfer of Conrail from Federal Government ownership into the private sector in the mideighties.

Crane came to Conrail after an already successful career in the railroad industry. His many accomplishments have included significant contributions to railroad engineering as well as his achievements as an executive.

The establishment of the L. Stanley Crane professorship at the George Washington University is a fitting tribute to Crane, who was named a trustee of George Washington University in May 1978 and was elected vice chairman of the Board of trustees in 1986. He still serves as vice chairman.

I am sure that I join many other Philadelphians and Members of Congress in honoring Crane and wishing him well upon his retirement.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS SHOULD NOT BE HINDERED BY EXCISE TAXES

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, through passage of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987, a new tax was placed on our educational institutions. For the first time, educational institutions became subject to excise taxes on the experimental or research-related use of denatured distilled spirits.

In 1988, Congress amended this law by exempting certain educational institutions from the excise taxes. The institutions exempted were those which procure less than 25 gallons of specially denatured distilled spirits for experimental or research use but not for consumption or sale. While this provision took us in the right direction, it did not go far enough.

Our educational institutions, which are striving to become more competitive academically and make scientific advances with commercial applications, should not be hindered by excise taxes. That is why I am introducing legislation today to exempt from the excise tax all scientific universities, colleges of learning, and institutions of scientific research which use distilled spirits for experimental or research purposes but not for consumption or sale.

Science should not be impeded by government failures to come to grips with Federal spending. The Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1987 was a masterful job of deficit reduction through too great a reliance on tax increases and not enough emphasis on spending reductions. I voted against this bill and urge my colleagues to consider its many provisions and begin in earnest the process of undoing those which unfairly tax our society.

SEED MONEY FOR DEMOCRACY

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 27, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, the National Endowment for Democracy was established in 1983 to strengthen democratic values and institutions around the world through nongovernment efforts. It receives an annual appropriation from the U.S. Congress.

The Endowment has supported democracy in many parts of the world by contributing to the development, and in some cases the very survival, of a wide array of free institutions, such as political parties, business associations, trade unions, public policy institutions, cooperatives, and civic organizations. Democracy now has a chance to grow and flourish in Chile, Argentina, Peru, the Philippines, and South Africa, to mention a few of the countries where Endowment grants have made a difference. The Endowment has also been active in Eastern Europe, especially in Poland.

The Endowment recently celebrated its fifth anniversary, and it has compiled a record to which we can all point with pride. The Endowment has established a global program of assistance in response to requests from hundreds of organizations and has worked to strengthen new democracies, support democratic transactions, open closed societies, and aid proponents of peaceful democratic change in countries wracked by conflict and violence.

Fortunately, the Endowment's fifth anniversary did not pass unnoticed. I would like to command to the attention of :ny colleagues two recent, articles, George Will's column from the December 19th Washington Post, "Seed Money for Democracy," and a December 23rd Wall Street Journal editorial, "An Ideology for All Seasons." I would also like to extend my personal congratulations to the Endowment on its fifth anniversary, and more importantly, on the contributions it has made to democratic development since 1983. I look forward to even greater contributions from the Endowment in the years ahead.

SEED MONEY FOR DEMOCRACY

(By George Will)

LOS ANGELES—The National Endowment for Democracy, one of this decade's good deeds, last week celebrated its fifth birthday as quietly as it does its works and with the scant public acclaim that usually comes to institutions that are unobtrusively useful.

This private and bipartisan grant-making body, which is funded by Congress, was originally viewed with suspcion by people too fastidious to countenance any U.S. "interference," however delicate, in the "internal affairs," however, promising, of any nation, however, situated. Today's NED's spending is the biggest bargain in government. It is one reason why the percentage of the world's population classified by Freedom House as living in "free" countries is 38.3 percent an all-time high.

The people at NED know too much about the complexities of popular government to claim inordinate credit for the undeniable progress of democracy in this decade. But they are teachers of the learned art of democracy. They know how to prepare the stony ground of authoritarian societies for the seeds of democratic skills—organization, mass persuasion.

NED's mission is to direct open support, financial and technical, to groups working to enrich the institutions of civil society beneath the brittle crust of oppressive regimes. NED contributed to the crumbling of that crust in Chile in October.

In the referendum against the Pinochet dictatorship, democracy won a narrow (54 percent) victory because of a huge turnout (92 percent of the electorate). The margin of victory can reasonably be credited to polling and other assistance from American political consultants organized by NED. Funds from NED helped 200,000 poor voters acquire the small photographs required of voters. This cost just $25,000.

NED is one reason why Poland today has a thousand independent cultural institutions—publishers of books and periodicals, film-makers, schools. Such small efforts can, cumulatively, crack political concrete.

Carl Gershman, NED's president, believes that for many centuries many factors—"the Crusades, which decimated the nobles; the printing press, which spread knowledge to all classes; the discovery of America, which gave opportunity to millions"—have had a tendency to help democracy. But he also knows that a tendency is not an inevitability. And he knows that this century, with its most important political innovation, totalitarianism, has posed the danger that new tendencies (bureaucratization, refinements of terror, propaganda, and other means of social control) might mean that democracy is an arrangement accessible only to a minority of privileged nations.

The year 1975 was pivotal. Indochina fell to communism and Indira Gandhi's state of emergency turned the world's largest democracy into the world's second-largest dictatorship. But regimes in Portugal, Spain and Greech were democratized. For the first time in history, Western Europe was cleansed of dictatorship.

Larry Diamond of the Hoover Institution, writing in The Washington Quarterly, notes that since then there has emerged "a kind of global Zeitgeist for democracy." Starting from various points, there have been varieties of progress in the Philippines, South Korea, Taiwan, Thailand, the Dominican Republic, Grenada, Haiti, Argentinia, Bolivia, Brazil, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru, Uruguay, Nigeria, among other nations.

In North Atlantic nations, democracy often came gradually and from above, with the slow widening of competition among elites. Today the task in the Third World is the transition from authoritarianism by means of gradualism from below. What Diamond calls the "efflorescence of associational life" requires "the reconstruction of a boundary between the state and civil society." Such reconstruction is NED's speciality.

Authoritarian regimes become porous as civil society becomes enriched with independent business, labor, religious, cultural and other mediating institutions serving as buffers between the individual and the state. As the autonomy of society grows, so do channels for articulating interests. Something else grows—the most potent solvent of hegemonic regimes, the broad and rapid diffusion of ideas, aspirations, information and awareness of possibilities.

Modernization destabilizes all but modern—pluralistic and democratic—societies and regimes. Modernization accelerates the circulation of people and information and the evaluation of political consciousness. This confronts authoritarian regimes (South Korea has been a case study) with what Diamond calls "a legitimacy contradiction, a kind of Catch-22."

If such regimes do not produce socioeconomic dynamism, they lost legitimacy because such progress is their justification for monopolizing power. If they do produce dynamism, it has political repercussions in intensified demands for participation, which the regimes cannot satisfy without liquidating themselves.

NED is a forthright but deft instrument for helping others bring about peaceful liquidations. Yet its tiny budget ($15.8 million), the source of so much leverage, has been repeately cut. Surely the government can find a more eligible target for frugality.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Dec. 23, 1988]

AN IDEOLOGY FOR ALL SEASONS

Human bondage has not been banished from the world, but in this Christmas season 1988 the signs of its lessening are encouraging. As modern communications open up once-benighted areas, ruling elites find it increasingly difficult to suppress what 18th-century philosophers defined as the "rights of man."
